Mr. SMOOT. When he signed the contract with the Government to do the work he knew exactly what the law of 1905 was.

Mr. MYERS. I will have something to say about that in a few moments. They were ignorant of the law and so were the people who entered into the Bellefourche project a short time prior to the period when this project was entered into. In the case of the Bellefourche project a banker and his counsel were ignorant of the law, and Congress gave that banker relief, while in this case those ignorant of the law were poor workingmen, tradesmen, and small dealers, and the question is, Are we to have one law in this country for bankers and another law for laborers and small tradesmen?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, does the Senator say——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator say that since the repeal of the act of 1894 Congress has extended to a banker the same relief the Senator is asking for the people affected in this case?

Mr. MYERS. Yes, sir; to the amount of more than $20,000; and I simply want the same right to be granted certain workingmen, small tradesmen, and dealers in Montana and Wyoming that the banker in South Dakota had.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the Senator from Montana if there was not this very vital difference between the two cases, namely, that in the Bellefourche case the contract itself, which was entered into between the Government and the original contractors, recited that it was made under the law of 1894?

Mr. MYERS. Yes; after that law had been repealed and nobody knew that fact.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; but both the Government and the contractor entered into the contract upon the understanding that the law of 1894 was in force.

Mr. MYERS. In ignorance of the fact that it had been repealed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But both of them seem to have overlooked the fact that a very short time——

Mr. MYERS. They entered into a contract under a dead law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They both seemed to have overlooked the fact that a very short time prior to entering into the contract the law had been changed.

Mr. MYERS. Yes; the Senator is right. I will explain that a little later.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But both of them understood that it was a part of the contract itself.

Mr. MYERS. I think the Senator is right.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator from Utah a question before he sits down?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I merely desire to ask, in that connection, is it not true that bids in the case of the Bellefourche project were advertised before the law of 1905 was passed?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. And the contracts were entered into after it had been repealed.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. Entered into under a void law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is true that the advertisements were issued under the law of 1894 and that when the contract came to be made both parties evidently overlooked the fact that in the meantime the law had been changed.

Mr. MYERS. Yes; through ignorance of the law.

Mr. BORAH. But it resolves itself back into the proposition that in that case the relief was afforded from a mistake of Government officials, and precisely the same principle is involved in this case. In the one case the Government officials entered into a contract under a law which did not exist, and we relieved them, and that is the same proposition in this instance, although it is put in another way.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator from Montana permit me to say a word in answer to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The difference between the two cases is that the subcontractor or the people furnishing the material to the contractor in the case of the Bellefourche project would have exhibited to them a contract which recited that it was made under the law of 1894, and, going to the law of 1894 and having a right to rely upon the recitals in the contract, they would find that they had a right upon the bond superior to that of the Government, while in the case we are now considering the contract recites that it is made under the law of 1905, and the subcontractors who deal with the contractor see by the contract itself that it refers to a law under which their rights are postponed to those of the Government. In the one case innocent parties are misled by the declarations in the contract, and in the other case they are not.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that does not change at all the principle involved here. In that case we did not go into the question as to whether or not it would cost the settlers a little more money, and the objection that is raised here to defeat this measure was not raised in that case at all, but because the Government officials had made a mistake and there was suffering by reason of that mistake relief was afforded.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will say in reply to the Senator from Utah that it is further true that we can not get away from the inevitable and indisputable fact that under the strict letter of the law the bank of Bellefourche, S. Dak., would have lost over $20,000 had not the Congress of the United States, in a fair, equitable, and just spirit, passed a law to reimburse the bank for that amount; and that is all we are asking here.

As I was saying, this bill simply gives these people the right they would have had under the law of 1894 in regard to suing first on the contractor's bond. As to whether it gives them any lien on anything, whether the amount may be taxed to the remaining acreage of the land, I do not say; that is another proposition. All we want is the right to sue first on the bond. What the after consequences may be and what the rights of the United States may be is another question.

This contract was let very shortly—within two or three weeks, I think—after the law of 1894 had been repealed by the law of 1905. The law of 1905, repealing the law of 1894 and taking away from creditors the first right to have recourse upon the bond, had only just barely taken effect when this contract was entered into. I will admit the showing is that the contractor who entered into the contract and the people who let him have the supplies and advanced the money were all ignorant of the fact that the law of 1894 had been repealed, and the people who furnished the money and supplies thought they were protected by the law of 1894, when, in fact, it had been repealed just a short time—a few days or weeks—before. I will admit they were ignorant of the law.

We have a precedent for the proposed action. Congress has established a precedent almost precisely analogous in fact and absolutely analogous in principle for the relief asked in this bill. I refer to a similar bill in the case of the Bellefourche project.

Mr. CLAPP. Here is the act in full, if the Senator desires to refer to that.

Mr. MYERS. Yes; it is precisely the same as this act.

In regard to this bond, I will say it is my understanding the Government is suing on this bond to recover the amount that it cost the Government to complete the work over and above the contract price, about $180,000. If it settles on $42,000 and gets the money, that is something with which these creditors have nothing to do. They get no part of that money. I shall now quote from a report of the House committee on the bill for the relief of the Bellefourche bank. A few years ago there was another contract of a similar character entered into by the Government, and a bank in Bellefourche, S. Dak., advanced money to the contractor, just as money and supplies were advanced in this case. The contractor failed and left the bank holding an indebtedness of about $22,000. Congress had enacted the law of 1905 and the bank found itself unable, owing to that law, to have the first right of recourse upon the contractor's bond. The bond was not sufficient to protect both the Government and the bank; so a bill was introduced in Congress to give the bank of Bellefourche, S. Dak., the first right to sue on the contractor's bond, to have first recourse on that bond. I will read from the report of the House Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands the facts in regard to the bill for the relief of the Bellefourche bank. That report gives a history of the Bellefourche case:

The Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 2522) for the relief of the First National Bank of Bellefourche, S. Dak., having considered the said bill and subject matter in connection therewith, in lieu thereof respectfully submits and recommends the passage of the bill which this report accompanies.

The evidence brought before the committee tends to show the following facts: That on February 10, 1905, the honorable Secretary of the Interior caused an advertisement to be published calling for sealed proposals for the work provided in schedule 2 of the main supply canal of the Bellefourche irrigation project in South Dakota in accordance with the specifications prepared therefor; that the said specifications, among other things, provided in specification No. 35 as follows:

"Claims for work and material: The contractor shall promptly make payments to all persons supplying labor and materials in the prosecution of the work, and a condition to this effect shall be incorporated in the bond to be given by the contractor in pursuance of the act of Congress approved August 13, 1894." (28 Stat., 278.)

That the act of Congress approved August 13, 1894, and referred to herein was entitled "An act for the protection of persons furnishing material and labor for the construction of public works," and provides, among other things, that any person or persons entering into a contract with the United States for the prosecution of any public work shall be required, before commencing such work, to execute a penal bond with good and sufficient sureties, and "with the additional obligation that such contractor or contractors shall promptly make payments to all persons supplying him or them labor and materials in prosecution of the work provided for in such contract," and that persons "supplying such labor and materials shall have a right of action and shall be authorized to bring suit in the name of the United States for his or their use and benefit against said contractor and sureties and to prosecute the same to final judgment and execution: Provided, That such action and its prosecution shall involve the United States in no expense."

The effect of this act was to give the persons supplying material and labor for the prosecution of public works a right of action upon the contractor's bond and to give such persons a prior right for compensation in advance of the claims of the United States in so far as the contractor's bond was concerned. The contract for the construction of the main supply canal of the Bellefourche irrigation project was executed by the Secretary of the Interior on behalf of the United States, and by the Widell-Finley Co., a Minnesota corporation, on its own behalf, and bears date of April 26, 1905. This contract recites that it is made "in accordance with the terms of the attached advertisement, proposal, and specifications, the same being made a part of this contract * * *." Attached to and a part of the contract was a copy of the advertisement of February 10, 1905, and also a copy of the proposal and specifications for the construction of the said canal, containing section 35, making provision for the protection of claims for work and material by the bond to be given under the act of August 13, 1894, as herein set forth.

On February 24, 1905, Congress passed an act the effect of which was to repeal the act of August 13, 1894, and to postpone the rights and claims of persons furnishing material and labor in the construction of public works to the claims of the United States in connection therewith. In other words, the effect of the act of February 24, 1905, would be to give the claims of the United States priority over labor and material claims, which were made prior by the act of August 13, 1894, as to the protection afforded by the bond of the contractors.

Note what the report says now about the Bellefourche project:

Neither the bondsmen nor the contractors were aware of the act of February 24, 1905, when they entered into the contract for the construction of this main canal, for both in the advertisement and in the contract reference is made to the act of August 13, 1894.

Mind you, an act which had been repealed.

Here are the grounds on which this relief was granted:

The verified petition of the First National Bank of Bellefourche sets forth that the bank advanced the sum of $17,680.04 for laborers' time checks for work done by laborers under this contract and the sum of $2,000 to Widell-Finley Co. upon their promissory note for money advanced with which to pay for labor used upon the said public work. The said verified petition also sets forth that before making the said advance the bank received legal advice and counsel as to whether they would be protected in such advances by the contractor's bond; that the bank was assured and advised that the act of August 13, 1894, referred to in the contract would fully protect the claims for labor and material and would fully protect the bank as assignee of such claims, and that, relying upon the said advice and assurances as set forth in the said contract, the bank advanced or paid the amount of money herein set forth for the said purposes.

Here is the language of the committee:

It appears to the committee that these facts make a very strong equitable case. There may be other persons similarly situated toward the work done under this contract. Apparently all persons proceeded in ignorance of the changed condition of the law, and this case affords a striking illustration of the strong equity that always arises where the parties to a contract act under a mutual mistake of the law. It would be manifestly unjust for the irrigation project to accept the full benefit of the work performed by the laborers, and the materials furnished under the contract, and not allow to the parties interested the protection of the bond and its sureties as recited both in the advertisement and in the contract itself.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does not the Senator understand, then, that the Government passed that amount on to the settler and the $20,000 was taxed up to him and he paid it, instead of the Government?

Mr. MYERS. Yes; and I am going to reach that point in a moment.

Now, the only difference——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I will ask the Senator from Montana or the Senator from South Dakota how the Government passed it up to the settler, when he had already a contract covering his price.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not pretend to know. I simply asked the question for information.

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator from Montana will yield to me, I think I can answer the question.

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. When the first estimates for the construction of the Roosevelt irrigation project in Arizona were made and promulgated it was understood that the entire project would cost about $4,000,000, and the landowners thus signed contracts in the belief that the project would not cost above $4,000,000. The project was in the nature of a pioneer proposition, and much of the work was experimental, and from one reason upon the other the cost has now reached a sum a little upward of $9,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. Did the settlers give up their first contracts?

Mr. ASHURST. They were compelled to modify them in order that the construction work might proceed.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know what made them give up their contracts, but we in Idaho refused and did not give up the contracts, and only those who voluntarily waived the contracts went into the new contracts.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Arizona whether or not the cost of this project and of all irrigation projects was not largely increased by the enormous increase in the price of labor and supplies and material during the period subsequent to 1902.

Mr. ASHURST. That addition and necessary works and equipment partly increased the cost is quite true; but surely the wise and just rule would be that where any inequity, wrong, or injustice is done the party responsible for it, instead of the innocent party, should bear the burden; and certainly, under the circumstances, the party most capable of paying, instead of the party least capable, should bear the burden.

Mr. MYERS. I have stated the facts in regard to the Bellefourche project and the Bellefourche reimbursement, which was purely an equitable act on the part of Congress, that could not have been compelled in any way under the law and it could not have been had in any other way.

Now, then, the only difference that the Secretary of the Interior seeks to make between the Bellefourche project and this project is this: It is about three lines long, contained in the report of the Secretary of the Interior:

> On the Bellefourche project the contract was advertised for before the rule of priority was changed by the act of 1905, though actually let thereafter.

The repeal of the law of 1894 just split in two the proceeding under the Bellefourche project. The contract was advertised for before the repeal of the law of 1894 took effect, but the contract was entered into afterwards and under the law of 1905.

Now, then, it happened that the Corbett Tunnel project came on just a few weeks later and was advertised for and let under the law of 1905. But in both cases all parties to the proceedings were ignorant of the repeal of the law of 1894, and this explanation of the Secretary of the Interior does not do away at all with the fact that the Bank of Bellefourche, S. Dak., would have suffered a loss of $20,000 and more if a bill in the nature of equitable relief had not been passed through Congress for the relief and reimbursement of that bank and approved by the President.

So it was a voluntary and equitable act by Congress, which could not be compelled by any power on earth, for relief which could not be granted under the law nor had through the courts nor had in any other way on earth. Congress enacted this law for the relief of the Bank of Bellefourche, S. Dak., and that is all that is asked in this bill under consideration.

I was asked a question a moment ago by the Senator from South Dakota as to whether this money that was voted or the right that was given to the bank at Bellefourche to have the first right to recover money out of the bond operated to increase the price of the work on the land under the project. The reclamation officials figured out and reported that it would make a certain raise, a certain increase, but whether that increase was ever levied and actually enforced or not I do not know, and the papers and records of this case do not show. I have nothing before me to show, but conceding that it was levied and exacted on the people on the Bellefourche project for the benefit of a bank at Bellefourche, S. Dak., is it right and proper that it should have been levied and exacted in that case for the benefit of the bank and then when we get to this case of poor laboring people and small tradesmen and dealers that that point should be raised to estop proceedings in this matter; that a differentiation should be had between the two cases; that it should be an estoppel or objection or obstacle in this case and should not have been in that case?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Would the Senator from Montana have any objection to a proviso attached to this bill which would say specifically that the amount paid by the Government should not be assessed upon those settlers?

Mr. MYERS. We can not do that, after this bill has been acted on by both branches of Congress and has been vetoed by the President. The only question now is, Shall the bill be passed over the veto of the President? That is all.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is one of the reasons why it is a very serious proposition as to whether this veto should not be sustained; and I am not governed by any desire to please either the Secretary of the Interior or the President——

Mr. MYERS. I know that.

Mr. CRAWFORD (continuing). Or to discriminate in favor of any bank in my State.

Mr. MYERS. I know that.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I have in mind all the time the settlers upon these claims and their right in the premises; and it seems to me so flagrantly unjust to make them bear the burden of the mistake, the improvidence, and the incompetence of either Government officials or of Government contractors that I protest against in any way making them bear the burdens of failures of that kind.

Mr. MYERS. It is not established by any facts or record that I have or know of that the increased cost was taxed to the settlers in the Bellefourche project.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to suggest that it seems to me in this discussion we ought to think something of the poor people who have gone into the project. They have got nothing. Every dollar they had has gone into it. Certainly they ought to have some protection. And who ultimately pays it is not of so much consequence to me as that these people who lost all they had by trusting the Government's contractors, because they believed their figures were accurate, should be made good. Certainly, we ought to have some consideration for them.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I want to say frankly that I am in favor and heartily in favor of making good the claims of these laborers, but I want it done by the Government, out of the Government Treasury, and I do not want it shifted over to the settlers upon these projects, and I want that point settled.

Mr. BORAH. I ask again how can they put it upon the settlers who have a contract?

Mr. NEWLANDS. My understanding is that as to the contracts——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. My understanding is that as to contracts, the settler is called upon to pay a proportionate part of the cost, whatever it may be. Now, then, if the Government is compelled to pay these subcontractors, it becomes a part of the enterprise, and hence the proportionate part of it is imposed upon each one of the settlers. I admit the hardship upon the settler, but——

Mr. BORAH. The contracts provide that so much per acre shall be the amount the settler is to pay.

Mr. NEWLANDS. My understanding is that when the Government enters upon one of these projects, it makes an estimate as to what it will cost, and announces what its estimate is, and then it is known what each acre will be called upon to pay. That estimate is not absolutely accurate, but——

Mr. BORAH. We have found that out.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But that estimate does not constitute a contract between the Government and the settler that the settler will pay only the amount of the estimate. The obligation of the settler is to pay his proportion of the cost, whatever it may be.

Mr. BORAH. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me to say one word further, following 1902, when the irrigation act was passed, there was a phenomenal rise, as we all know, in the cost of labor and materials. Hence the estimates made with reference to the cost of the project were almost in all cases underestimates, and as I understand the actual cost is apportioned among the settlers regardless of the estimate.

The result has been that the settler has been in many cases compelled to pay much more than the amount of the original estimate. I am glad to say, however, that the value of the land reclaimed has been so great as not to make this a serious imposition upon the settler, particularly in view of the fact that the Interior Department has been exceedingly considerate in extending the time of payments.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know what is the contract covering each and every reclamation project, or what are its terms, but I do know that this question was raised in my State upon a particular project. The settlers had a contract of $22.50 an acre. The Government found it had to impose a greater amount, but it had no power to do so of its own motion. It had to enter into negotiations with the parties upon the project and get, for a proper consideration, a yielding up of the first contract, and that was conceded—that they could not change the $22.50 unless the Government would give the settlers a special consideration in the way of the extension of time, and so forth, to induce them to give up their contracts. I do not know how it is in any other State, but I understood that was the general contract. That was true in Idaho.

Mr. MYERS. I will say, with great respect to all concerned, that I must decline to yield further. I appreciate the suggestions of those who are in favor of this measure, which have been helpful, and I have taken into consideration those of a counter nature, but I want to finish in a few minutes what I have to say and then yield the floor, and if my statement does no good, I hope it will do no harm.

I say again as to the question whether or not that increased cost was taxed to the settlers upon the Bellefourche project I do not know. If it was, from the statement of the Senator from Idaho, which I receive and accept, there was no law for it.

I believe that the department has in some instances imposed upon settlers an additional cost in these matters, but I know of no law for it. The Senator from Idaho says there is no law for it. That being the case, whatever may be done in this case, no increased cost can be taxed to the settler, but even if it were taxed to the settler it would be no more than may have been done in the Bellefourche case. I will read the report of the Reclamation Service on the Bellefourche case. This is the report of the Reclamation Department to a House committee on this Bellefourche bill. This is what the department has to say about it:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES RECLAMATION SERVICE,
Washington, D. C., January 31, 1910.

SIR: In compliance with your request at the hearing before the subcommittee to-day, the following information is submitted regarding contract No. 37 with the Widell-Finley Co. for the construction of the main supply canal, Bellefourche project, which is involved in the bill (H. R. 2522) for the relief of the First National Bank of Bellefourche, S. Dak.

The Government has paid to the Widell-Finley Co. for estimates covering the work completed to December 31, 1905.

The value of the work performed by the company and retained by the United States consists of the following items: (1) Twenty per cent of the amount earned to December 31, which, under the terms of paragraph 64 of the contract, is held back until the completion of the work by the contractor to the satisfaction of the Government, amount to $10,726; (2) the estimate for the work done in January, 1906, $9,024.38; (3) estimate for the work performed up to the date of bankruptcy, February 15, 1906, $3,917.20; total, $23,667.58.

Just as it paid up to the time of the failure in this case.

In answer to your question regarding the added cost per acre to the settler which would result from the Government releasing its prior right to the proceeds of the bond which it might claim under the act of February 24, 1905, it is very difficult to make a statement.

The charge for the project heretofore announced is $30 per acre of irrigable land. The amount of irrigable land already covered by completed work is about 50,000 acres. The total amount estimated to be irrigated under the project is 100,000 acres. The area over which the $21,500 would be distributed in case the Government could not collect it would depend upon the acreage not opened to water-right application at the time this matter is finally settled and the exact amount of the Government loss is determinable. Assuming that this amount would be one-half the irrigable acreage of 50,000 acres, the distribution of the sum of $21,500 would be equivalent to 43 cents per acre, or $34.40 for the usual 80-acre farm unit taken by the settler.

Very respectfully,

MORRIS BIEN, Supervising Engineer.

Hon. W. F. ENGLEBRIGHT,
House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Montana has evinced a very ardent desire to proceed with the consideration of the bill he is now engaged upon. On the whole, I am inclined to think it will be a saving of the Senate's time if that matter is allowed to go ahead now and reach a vote, rather than to come up every morning and go over the same ground again. Therefore I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Montana will proceed.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, this report only says what the increase would be if levied. It does not say it must be levied. There is nothing here to so show. There is nothing to show that it ever was taxed to the settler in that case, and I undertake to say that if it were not so taxed in that case it will not be in this case.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] says there is no law for it. I know of no law for it. I accept his statement of the matter. He has looked into it. If there is no law for it, it can not be done if the settlers resist it. That is all there is to that.

Furthermore, the very valuable suggestion was made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] that, if it should be and is to be levied upon the land, it can only apply to settlers who come hereafter, and if they do not wish to take the land at this cost they need not take it. There is no law compelling them to do it. They would go into it with their eyes open, voluntarily, knowing what they have to pay. They would make inquiry, and if they should want to pay the extra cost, who is there who says they must not pay it?

I think that clearly and completely exculpates the proposition of added cost. But even if it were to be levied the Secretary of the Interior says, in regard to this case, that it would be a maximum charge of 91 cents per acre and a minimum charge of 33 cents per acre, and that on an average holding of 60 acres there would be a maximum burden or $54.60 and a minimum burden of $19.80. That would be an average of $36.50 additional on each 60 acres, if it were required to be paid. In the Bellefourche project there was figured an average increase of $34.40 on each 80-acre tract.

Mr. President, no amount of argument can evade the proposition that whether this additional money was levied on the remaining and untaken lands of the Bellefourche project or not, whether it will be in this case or not, action in the nature of voluntary relief was taken in favor of the Bellefourche Bank in the Bellefourche project. The right was given to have first recourse on the contractor's bond, and that is all that is provided for by this bill under consideration. The relief asked for in this case is precisely the relief asked for and granted by Congress and approved by the President of the United States in the case of the Bellefourche Bank. The relief asked in the two cases is precisely the same. The effect must be the same. The law, in so far as it affects the land, is the same; and while the facts slightly differ, while there is a hair's breadth of difference as to the two contracts, yet there was a mistake of law in both cases, even more egregious and inexcusable in the Bellefourche project than in this case, because from the reports here it appears that the United States officials who let that contract did not even themselves know of the repeal of the act of 1894. There was a mistake of law in both cases, and in each case it resulted in the inability under the existing law of the creditors to recover or to sue on the bond. So the cases in principle are precisely analogous.

Now, I want to refer to a matter which has been spoken of here, and that is the proposition of paying this $42,000 twice. I say the record shows and it is a fact that when the Government took hold of this project it completed the work honestly and fairly and economically. There is no charge of waste or extravagance or corruption or dishonesty. There is nothing in the record to show any intimation or any suspicion of wastefulness or extravagance or misappropriation of funds. The contractor took the work too low. He executed the contract as far as he could go and until he failed financially. The only trouble with him was that he took his contract so low that he could not pay his workmen and his creditors, but the work was well and honestly done. The Government lost nothing by it, the settlers lost nothing by it. Then he failed. Then the Government of the United States took hold of the work and carried it on to completion in a fair, reasonable, economical manner, without any waste or extravagance, and I say every dollar that has gone into this project has been honestly and economically expended. If this $42,000 is allowed to be recovered on the bond, then the settlers will get the benefit of it and if they should pay the additional cost, which I do not believe they would have to pay, they would only be paying for what they would get. They would be getting value received for their money. They would be paying quantum meruit. They would be paying only the reasonable worth of what they would get.

I wish to refer here to something that is very significant. There is no charge that the Government of the United States did not handle this work economically, competently, and properly. There is no charge of wastefulness or extravagance, but the Government proceeded to and did do the work at a fair, reasonable, justifiable cost.

The work that the contractor did on his part of the contract was done $56,000 cheaper than the ratio at which the Government did the work, which goes to show that the contractor took the work at a ruinous price; that he took it too low, because the Government did this work in a fair, economical, businesslike manner, without wasting or squandering any money, and intending to give the settlers the value of what they paid for; but yet the contractor having taken his contract at a ruinously low figure, at a figure whereby he was not able to pay his workmen and for his supplies, and which broke up the man and drove him into bankruptcy, his share of the work was done $56,000 less than the Government would have done it for, and $56,000 less than the ratio of cost at which the Government did its share of the work. Yet there is no charge that the Government did not handle the work honestly and economically.

So if this $42,000 be recovered from the bonds, and even if it should come out of the land owners, they would be then getting the work that the contractor did at $14,000 less than if the Government had taken the whole job and completed it.

I say, Senators, that even if the settlers should have to pay this money they are only paying for what went into that work; they are only paying the cost of it; they are getting the worth of their money; and they are getting it cheaper than they would have gotten it if the Government had taken hold of the project and carried it from the beginning.

Is there any chicanery, is there any injustice, is there anything wrong in that? It seems to me that in the language of the report of the House committee in the Bellefourche case this presents a strong appeal to the sense of justice and equity of Congress. I have the figures here which bear out what I have to say. It is a statement in regard to the matter compiled from the records.

In the matter of the Corbett Tunnel claims, after having paid these claims, facts and figures prove conclusively that the irrigation project will not have cost the settlers any more than it was reasonably worth, and no more than it would have cost had the Government done the work in full, instead of 83.8 per cent of it. On page 11 of Hearing No. 2 before the House Committee on Irrigation, May 4, 1912, are facts and figures, offered by the supervising engineer of the Reclamation Service, which prove that the amount paid to the contractors for the proportion of the work done by them, viz: 16.2 per cent of the full amount of the contract, up to the time of their suspension, was far less than was the cost to the Government, proportionately, after taking over the project. The figures are as follows:

Full amount of cost of project, $933,075.

Which the contractor undertook to do for $750,000—far less than it was worth—and thereby came all this train of evils and troubles.

Full amount of cost of project	$933,075
Amount paid to contractor for 16.2 per cent of contract	104,085
Amount paid for completing 83.8 per cent of project (by Government)	828,990
Average cost of 16.2 per cent of contract by Government	160,218
Total amount paid contractors for 16.2 per cent	104,085
Total credit balance of first 16.2 per cent project	56,133

The above figures prove that the cost to the project of performing the first 16.2 per cent of the work by the contractors was $56,133 less than the amount required to perform the same proportion of the work at any time thereafter, and is accounted for by the fact that over $40,000 of it was contributed by labor and material men and the balance by the contractors themselves.

I say that upon the whole record there is no crookedness or dishonesty or wastefulness or extravagance in this matter. The Government had to take hold of the work and complete it, on account of having driven a hard bargain with a contractor who broke himself up in trying to fulfill it. The Government took hold of it and finished it without any scandal or suspicion or intimation of waste or extravagance. It did it in a businesslike, economical manner, and even if this $42,000 should come out of the settlers, or may come out of the settlers, which I deny, they would be getting the work done for less than if the Government had done it from the beginning—$14,000 less. They would be getting it done for less than a reasonable cost. The settlers are not hurt. But, as I said, even if the settler should be required to pay, any settler who goes on that land goes on it with his eyes open. You can not drag any settler on the land. He will inquire and learn what he has to pay, and if he goes on with his eyes open and wants to pay his price, who is there here who says he must not be allowed to pay it, if he thinks the land is worth the money? If he is willing to pay the money, why should he not be allowed to do it?

I tell you, Senators, that if relief is denied in this case there is no avenue of escape from the fact that Congress will have declared that there is one law for bankers and another law for workingmen, small tradespeople, and small merchants. It is the cry all over this country that there is one law for the rich and another law for the poor. We all deplore that cry. While there may be some ground for it, I am not in favor with giving any further ground or reason whatsoever for such complaints. I believe that courts ought to be careful to administer the laws in the same manner and spirit to all classes of people, high and low, rich and poor, bankers and workingmen.

If courts will administer the same law to all classes of people, there will not be nearly so much clamor for the recall of judges. I believe, in my humble judgment, if I may be permitted to say it here, in my humble way, that Congress, equally with the courts, ought to be careful and painstaking to enact the same law for the rich and the poor, the high and the low, the bankers, the workingmen, and the small tradespeople.

Here is an opportunity to do it. This Bellefourche bill, which is exactly analogous in principle and from which there is no avenue of escape, Senators, went through Congress and was approved by the President. The President said nothing about it in his message. He refers only to the report of the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior says very little about the Bellefourche project. He differentiates it from the case under consideration only in one insignificant particular, which does not take the case out of the same class. He does not, can not, abolish the analogy. He overlooks that proposition. I say in all fairness and honesty that the Government of the United States ought to treat all citizens, whether bankers or laboring men, rich or poor, high or low, with the same sort of consideration and fairness.

Now, I say to you, Senators, there is merit in this proposition; there is equity in this proposition; and there is justice and fairness in it. If Congress had seen fit to exact its pound of flesh and stand on the exact hair-splitting technicality of the cold, hard law the banker in Bellefourche, S. Dak., would never have been recompensed for his loss; but Congress justly and properly, in a sense of justice and fairness, departed from the strict technicality of the law existing in that case and granted fair and equitable relief. Why should it not do so in this case?

A word as to another thing that is apparent in all the hearings before the committees of the Senate and the House and in the discussion of this matter before this body and in the discussion of it before the House and in the discussions before the committees of Congress. This work is situated in Wyoming. If there be anybody voluntarily to pay any increased cost of land, if there be any settler who will feel one cent of this cost, it is in Wyoming; and if the Senators from Wyoming are not disposed to protest against this matter; if they are not disposed to protest against it as an imposition upon their State and their citizens; if they are not disposed to raise any objection; if they are willing to look upon it as fair and right and just, why should any other Senator in this body raise his voice against it? The Senators from Wyoming are those most directly interested, and never before any committee or in this body has any voice from Wyoming been raised against this bill; never by any Senator or Representative from Wyoming has it been branded as unjust.

In this case the people who are seeking this right to sue on this bond are not rich people; they are poor people. There is one good woman who has spent all winter and spring here looking after the interests of this bill. She and her husband, small merchants in Butte, Mont., have $10,000 tied up in this matter. Yet are they not to be allowed the same privilege that the Bellefourche (S. Dak.) banker had of suing first on this bond? If they are not allowed the same privilege, if this bill is not passed, they will lose every cent in the world they have. They will lose their home. They will lose their business. They will be cast adrift in the world with the savings of a lifetime lost and gone. They credited these people on the strength of the fact that they were dealing with the Government, believing that the law of 1894 was in force, and were so advised; and they are exactly in the same class as the Bellefourche banker. Now, these good people will be absolutely turned out penniless in the world, will lose their home and business, and every dollar they have in the world, if this relief is not granted to them.

Of course, that is no reason for enacting this bill, but it goes to show, I say in all earnestness, their rights in this matter, and that this bill ought to be as earnestly and as liberally and as conscientiously and as humanely considered as was the Bellefourche bill for the relief of a banker in Bellefourche, S. Dak.

Now, one word more. This is no political matter. It can have no political significance even if the bill be passed over the President's veto. You all know as well as I do that it can in no sense be any reflection upon the President. I esteem the President of the United States; I have a very high esteem and personal regard for him. Not one word of disparagement or degradation concerning him comes from me. I regard him as a very admirable man personally. I can not see that such an act as this would cast one iota of reflection upon him. Notwithstanding I esteem him, however, I am not going to surrender my judgment for his judgment; I am not going to surrender my prerogative for his prerogative.

I have much esteem, too, for the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Fisher. I have at all times at the hands of Secretary Fisher received the most courteous treatment and considerate attention. My relations with him have always been pleasant. But I am not on that account going to surrender my judgment for his, and I do not believe that the Senate of the United States ought to surrender its prerogative of legislation to either one of those gentlemen, simply because they hold contrary opinions.

Now, as to the veto message of the President, he simply referred this to a department, and I dare say the Secretary simply referred it to some under official in his office. I can hardly believe that the Secretary has given this his strict personal attention. But it raises the same old proposition, are we to legislate by departmental action? Is the legislative function of this Government to be surrendered to department officials? Has it come to a pass where one man or two men shall tell us what legislation we can and can not pass? It has almost come to that pass where we have to go hat in hand and in humble attitude and demeanor ask some Government official if we can pass a certain bill.

We have to go and ask, Will you give your approval to this bill? Can we enact this legislation? When a bill is introduced the very first thing is to refer it some departmental official for his opinion as to whether it ought or ought not to become a law. I do not believe in that principle, Mr. President. I believe Congress ought to be jealous of its prerogatives and guard them more strictly than has been done. In this case the objections of the Secretary of the Interior were before the committee of the House and the committee of the Senate. They were fully considered by those committees, and those committees decided that there was nothing in them whatever. They decided that this case was precisely analogous to the Bellefourche case.

This body unanimously passed the bill in its present form and the House, with practical unanimity, passed it. Now, having taken that stand, simply because the President differs in opinion or because he referred it to some departmental official who differs from us, shall we surrender our views upon it? Shall we say that we unanimously voted for this bill and because the President or some departmental official says it ought not to pass we will recede and give way to his superior judgment?

I do not believe that that spirit ought to be dominant in this body. I believe this bill is just and proper. I believe it is a meritorious measure. I believe there is justice and fairness in it, and that the Government of the United States should not stand upon a hair-splitting technicality in a hard case and say to its citizens, We exact your pound of flesh. I believe the Government of the United States ought to deal honestly and liberally and in a fair and equitable spirit with its citizens, and in this case I believe, with all my heart and soul and feeling, that, notwithstanding the veto of the President, with all due respect to the President and the Secretary of the Interior, this bill ought again to be unanimously passed by this body.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, the question as to whether or not the veto of the President shall be sustained, so far as the political, personal, or official attitude of Senators toward him is concerned, has not entered my mind. I care absolutely nothing about that view of it. Naturally, if the question were confined to a simple proposal that the Government as a matter of justice should save these laborers or material men from loss and stop there, I would most cheerfully support the measure and vote against sustaining the veto of the President. I would not hesitate for one minute to so vote because the President belongs to my political party. There is just now little in the way of common sympathy between us, politically, to justify my giving that fact any consideration whatever, and I do not do so. But, Mr. President, it is very clear that it has been the custom heretofore in adjusting claims of this kind to pass the burden, temporarily carried by the Government, on to the settler. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], if I understood him correctly, in his reference to the Roosevelt dam, gave an instance of how, through the mismanagement of the Reclamation Service, the burden of the settlers upon those lands had been doubled. In the Bellefourche project the money paid to the bank appears to have been apportioned, and so far as any evidence is presented here that money was charged up to the settler.

The message of the President and the letter of the Secretary of the Interior clearly show that they have no other thought than that if this claim of $42,000 is paid the amount will be assessed against the settlers, and if not borne by those who are there now, it will be by those who settle upon these lands in the future.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to ask a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Certainly; just for a question, because we have taken a great deal of time in this discussion, and I do not wish to detain the Senate long.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to ask the Senator, even if it should increase the cost to these settlers, what harm would it do?

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is the point that I am going to discuss.

Mr. MYERS. They go there with their eyes open.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is what I am going to discuss. Mr. President, a stern necessity is every day driving men and women out into the desert, driving them out on the sun-parched plains, where year after year not sufficient rain falls to raise pasture for more than a few head of sheep; men who follow the instinct which craves a little piece of land take risks, endure hardships and privations, and face dangers equal to those met and endured by the soldier upon the battle field. I see them going into the western part of my State, and I see them sometimes coming back again with mere skeletons of horses drawing and cattle following the wagon; men and women with woebegone and hungry faces, who have struggled against hardship, disaster, drouth, and poverty, making their way back to some place where they may be able to exist during the approaching winter. Among the mountains and hills of Montana, as the Senator from that State knows, you will frequently see the dugout and cabin of the settler in many of the little, narrow, irregular draws or valleys in the arid or semiarid regions where some one is making a last desperate stand for the purpose of getting a little piece of God's footstool that he can call a home for his wife and his children.

The land which the Government still owns and in regard to which these laws have been passed for reclamation projects is held in trust. It is held for one purpose, and that avowed purpose is to make it possible for men with families, driven by stern necessity and following the desire which God gave to them to own a little piece of land somewhere, an opportunity to acquire it. The Government should only ask that the settler shall reimburse its actual and necessary expense legitimately incurred in building the project. Reimburse the Government for the mistakes, extravagance, and recklessness of its officers? No. Simply the cost incurred in the careful, discreet, and economical administration and execution of the enterprise or trust. Was it intended that the Government if it made a contract with some man to erect a great dam and neglected to take a bond from him, or took an insufficient bond, or employed an incompetent contractor—one who did not know how to carry on the work and who, through incompetency or recklessness, was unable to carry it on—was wasteful, improvident, and extravagant and failed, when another contractor of experience and prudence at the same figure might have made money—was it intended that all the losses sustained by subcontractors and material men in such case should be passed on and put upon the shoulders of the men who are to settle upon these lands and undertake, in a last struggle, to secure a home upon them?

This seems to be a case where some contractor and some Government official made blunders—I do not know where to place the responsibility, but blunders were made—and it is proposed that the losses be made good, in the first instance, out of the United States Treasury. I would cheerfully vote under all the circumstances that they might be made good in that way; but it is not to end with that, because the avowed purpose of these officials is that when that is done, the amount is to be carried over and charged to the settlers who will to-morrow and next year or the year following go out and settle upon the lands in that project, which means that the claims of these subcontractors are to be paid by the settlers and not by the Government. There I protest; upon that and that alone I make my protest. Brushing all questions of politics and policy aside, because in this case I care nothing about them. I protest in behalf of the settlers who may go upon these lands to-morrow or next year or the year following, because I think it is unjust and unfair to take action here that will permit these officials to do what they openly declare it to be their purpose to do in case this bill becomes a law—places the losses chargeable to the negligence of these subcontractors or of these Government officials—one or both—upon the shoulders of the prospective settlers upon that land. Unless the disposal of this veto can be made in a way which will satisfy me that these settlers will be protected, if mine is the only vote it shall be cast to sustain the veto, because I will not consent that this charge shall be passed on to the settlers.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it now becomes my duty to supplement the remarks I made a few moments ago in answer to the question propounded by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

The Newlands-Hansbrough Reclamation Act of June 17, 1902, in my judgment, is a lofty and enduring monument to the constructive statesmanship of the framers of that law, and especially to the great Senator from the State of Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], whom we all delight to honor.

Again referring to the Roosevelt project in Arizona, it was at first estimated that the cost of that project to the landowners and farmers would be about $3,750,000, but it is now ascertained that the cost will be about $10,000,000. The Senate desires to know how that has been brought about. A mere statement upon such a serious matter, unsupported and unfortified by any facts, would not be conclusive or even persuasive. Therefore, I give some of the reasons why this cost has proved larger than the original estimates.

I am not oblivious to the valuable service Mr. Newell, the Director of the Reclamation Service, has rendered to his country, and I am not ungrateful to Mr. Davis, the Government's engineer, for the service he has rendered. I honor him for the distinguished service he has performed, both in this country and in foreign countries, Turkestan, for instance; but that does not preclude my stating facts as they exist.

The Roosevelt project was in the nature of an experiment. It was an initial project, and for that reason mistakes were bound to occur. For instance, a lateral or a headgate might be erected at a place which the constructors in good faith believed was the proper location, in accordance with workmanlike principles; but subsequent facts might, and sometimes did, indicate that the constructors were mistaken. These unforeseen conditions and contingencies that could not have been anticipated partly brought about the increased cost. The estimate, made upon the cost of the Roosevelt project by the Reclamation Service at the time the contract was entered into between the Government and the Salt River Valley Water Users' Association, representing landowners, was $3,750,000; but by subsequent agreements made and entered into between the Government and said association the project has been enlarged and extended, so that when completed its cost will exceed $10,000,000, which sum, under the reclamation act and the contracts, becomes a lien upon the land of each landowner within the project in the proportionate amounts that the acreage of each individual's holding bears to the whole amount of land included within the project, and which provision makes certain the collection and repayment by the landowners to the reclamation fund of the cost of the project. This increase in the cost of the project over the original estimate will make the repayment within 10 years burdensome to some of the landowners, and in many instances will be in excess of their ability to bear.

As the work proceeded, it was ascertained that the enlargement of the project and the construction of the Granite Reef diversion dam would be necessary. This diversion dam cost $650,000. Then the Chandler system and Mesa system were purchased, which further increased the cost. In addition thereto a power plant was constructed, further increasing the cost over the original estimates, so that when the amount called for by the original estimates, namely, the $3,750,000, had been expended, the project was not one-half completed, and out of the very exigencies of the occasion—I might say by virtue of the doctrine ex necessitate rei—and under a species of menace or duress the landowners and water users were obliged to alter their contracts accordingly.

In the light of these facts—that is to say, by reason of the cost of the construction of the project, amounting to nearly three times as much as the original estimates called for, all of which has been brought about without any fault upon the part of the landowners—it seems to me that in the forum of morals, and, indeed, in strict justice, the Secretary of the Interior, with the consent of the landowners and water users' association, should enter into a supplemental contract with the association providing for the repayment of the cost of said project in 20 annual installments, without interest, instead of 10 annual installments as provided by the provisions of the act of June 17, 1902, and in my judgment the present law is fairly susceptible of being construed so that the payments may be made equally or in graduated amounts, as may be determined by the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ASHURST. With much pleasure.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to inquire whether the expenditure of the $9,000,000 only covered the work that it was expected the expenditure of $3,500,000 would cover?

Mr. ASHURST. It included other work.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does it not include much other work?

Mr. ASHURST. It does. The expenditure of $9,500,000 covers much other work, as I have already stated.

Mr. President, I repeat that in many instances the reclamation officials could not have foreseen and did not foresee the unpropitious conditions which inevitably arise in all affairs of this magnitude. I am convinced that the honorable Secretary of the Interior and the reclamation officials will clearly see the overwhelming equities and rights of the farmers, landowners, and water users under this project and will grant extensions of time on the payments.

Mr. President, these reclamation projects throughout the West reflect much credit upon the builders and upon the reclamation officers because success has been achieved by these officials after overcoming many obstacles. Doubtless, in some isolated instances, apparent injustices seem to have been done toward this or that particular landowner; but, taken as a whole, the American people should be, and no doubt are, justly proud of this great work, and we of the West are especially grateful to the builders of these giant dams and reservoirs.

Having expressed my appreciation of the creditable work performed by the Reclamation Service—and, indeed, it is a creditable work, valuable not to Arizona alone, but to the whole Nation—I will not be deemed ungenerous if in truth I advert to one circumstance which in my judgment reflects no credit upon the Reclamation Service, as follows:

During the construction of the project it was ascertained that an enormous amount of electrical power could be developed or generated by the Roosevelt project. The farmers, landowners, and water users were given to understand that this power so generated would be sold and thereby appreciable sums of money would continually be coming in to the credit of the project, which at first would assist in defraying the expenditures for "upkeep" and eventually would partly reimburse the Government for the moneys advanced. It was ascertained that the power developed at various points on the project would be about as follows: Roosevelt Dam, through reservoir, maximum horsepower, 5,200; (2) Tempe crosscut, maximum horsepower, 6,000; (3) South Canal, maximum horsepower, 3,000; (4) Arizona Canal falls, maximum horsepower, 700; and (5) at the dam the power canal now building has a maximum horsepower of 4,400.

But, Mr. President, the Reclamation Service, acting, as I believe, in absolute violation of the Sherman antitrust law, entered into a contract with a corporation in the city of Phoenix, namely, the Pacific Gas & Electric Co., to sell this electrical power for 1½ cents per kilowatt hour. The contract was made by Mr. Louis C. Hill, on behalf of the United States, with the Pacific Gas & Electric Co., and by its terms it promises to furnish that company electric current for 10 years at 1½ cents per kilowatt hour, and the Pacific Gas & Electric Co. in turn compels every householder to pay 12 cents per kilowatt hour. Until recently householders were compelled to pay 15 cents per kilowatt hour, and this company is thus enabled to exact these extortionate rates because the Government agreed to sell its power to said company under the following terms of contract, wherein the Government agrees (here I quote from the contract)—

To refrain from entering into a general retailing of power to customers in the city of Phoenix, Ariz., or from furnishing power to anyone in said city to be again sold or retailed.

This contract was in violation of section 3 of an act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraint and monopolies" (26 Stat. L., 209), which provides that:

Every contract * * * in restraint of trade or commerce in any Territory of the United States * * * is hereby declared illegal.

Mr. President, what a farce it is to observe trust busters fulminating and thundering in the index, the Government spending much money to enforce the Sherman antitrust law, and then, on the other hand, to observe the Government itself entering into a contract which on its face is a violation of that law. The power purchased by the Pacific Gas & Electric Co. is acquired at 1½ cents per kilowatt hour, while the Pacific Gas & Electric Co. sells that power to the citizens of Phoenix and other users of power and light at 12 cents per kilowatt hour.

The Pacific Gas & Electric Co. was incorporated in May, 1906, and is successor to the Phoenix Light & Fuel Co. The latter, in March, 1901, entered into a contract with the Arizona Water Co. for such water power as it might develop incidental to carrying water in canals from the Salt River to irrigate lands in the vicinity of Phoenix. A former owner in the Phoenix Light & Fuel Co. states that this old power contract was made not because of its value, but for fear competition might ensue in the lighting business if this possible power was not controlled.

Subsequent events prove that this power was as valueless as it was declared to be at that time, by experts who investigated it, for the reason that when the Salt River carried a great volume of water the canal company's diversion dam was destroyed, leaving the canal dry, and when there was no water in the river, of course, there could be none in the canals, and therefore no power. It was to remedy these conditions that the Government is expending $10,000,000 in the reclamation project, and which expenditure has made the matter of electrical power there much less hazardous. The United States acquired the Arizona Water Co.'s canals in June, 1907. The Pacific Gas & Electric Co., however, made good use of its asset of doubtful value—the old contract—as shown by the concurrence of the Reclamation Department.

Reputable attorneys who examined the old power contract were of opinion that the Government was neither morally nor legally obligated to consider it. Manifestly the people, generally, would enter no objection to the Reclamation Department selling power to the Pacific Gas & Electric Co., but they do object most strenuously to the Government of the United States using this old contract between two corporations as a basis for an exclusive contract by and between a grossly overcapitalized corporation vending a public necessity.

The Pacific Gas & Electric Co. is capitalized for nearly $1,500,000, and among other assets list the "franchises and rights" at $515,000. As its Phoenix franchise is not exclusive, nor can it be made so under Arizona law, it follows that this company has capitalized this Government exclusive contract as "rights," at $515,000, and which amount of itself is vastly in excess of the company's actual assets.

Mr. President, it is but fair that I should at this point ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD a copy from a page of the report of the Reclamation Service, giving its reasons for the contract.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the request is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

In purchasing the existing canal system certain obligations were assumed by the Reclamation Service for the supply of electricity to the Phoenix Railway & Light Co. The power canal used in the construction of the Roosevelt Dam is now applied to the generation of electricity for this company, with whom a 10-year agreement has been made, the electricity being furnished at the rate of 1½ cents per kilowatt hour for this period. No restrictions were included in this agreement as to the amount this company should charge the people of Phoenix. The receipts are used to diminish the operation and maintenance of the canal system.

The enlargement of the canals has been expensive, owing to the necessity of carrying on work while the ditches were in use, as the irrigation season lasts throughout the entire year on this project.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it is the little foxes that destroy the vines; and usually it is the weasel words lurking in an agreement or statement that disclose its vice. I direct especial attention to these words found in the matter above referred to:

No restrictions were included in the agreement as to the amount this company (that is, the Pacific Gas & Electric Co.) should charge the people of Phoenix.

Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that I may insert, at the end of my remarks, a memorial of the State Senate of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, asking the Attorney General of the United States to bring suit to set aside the contract with the Pacific Gas & Electric Co. as null and void and as being strictly in violation of the Sherman antitrust law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, leave is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Senate joint memorial 6.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Senate of the first State Legislature of Arizona, the House of Representatives concurring therein, most respectfully represent:

Whereas on the 22d day of June, 1907, the Reclamation Service, on the part of the United States Government, entered into a certain contract with the Pacific Gas & Electric Co., a corporation having its principal place of business in Phoenix, Ariz., which said contract related to the sale of electric power to be generated in the future by the Roosevelt reclamation project, in the Territory of Arizona, now the State of Arizona, and which said contract sold to said Pacific Gas & Electric Co. all of the electric power generated by said project to be used in the city of Phoenix, Territory of Arizona, now State of Arizona under the following terms contained in article 2 of said contract, to wit: "ART. 2. The party of the first part (the Government) further agrees while serving to the party of the second part (Pacific Gas & Electric Co.) under the terms of this contract, to refrain from entering into a general retailing of power to customers in the city of Phoenix, Ariz., or from furnishing power to anyone to be sold again or retailed. It is agreed, however, that the party of the first part shall have the right to sell or lease power in the city of Phoenix at any time in blocks of 100 to 500 kilowatts and over to anyone to be used in manufacturing industries, waterworks, or pumping plants"; and

Whereas said clause in said contract creates a monopoly and a trust in favor of said Pacific Gas & Electric Co. in said city of Phoenix, relieving it from competition and allowing it to charge consumers in the city of Phoenix charges for electric power controlled and governed only by its desire and conscience; and

Whereas the Twenty-fifth Territorial Legislature of the Territory of Arizona, in session in January and February, 1909, petitioned Congress to call upon the Secretary of the Interior to investigate said contract, to the end that, if found illegal, action be taken to annul same, and the civic organizations of the city of Phoenix, its mayor, and council protested to the Secretary of the Interior against said monopolistic contract, all without avail; and

Whereas a committee, appointed by the house of representatives, is now making a general investigation of the Roosevelt reclamation project, the records of which will be available to determine certain facts as to said contract: Therefore be it

Resolved by the First Legislature of the State of Arizona, That we earnestly and respectfully petition and request the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled, to call upon the Attorney General of the United States to procure said contract, and all correspondence and papers relating thereto, and to investigate said contract, and if upon investigation it appears that said contract is unjust, illegal, and creative of monopoly, the proper proceedings be brought to obtain abrogation and annulment of the same, at least to the extent of abrogating such portion of said article 2 as grants to said Pacific Gas & Electric Co. an exclusive monopoly; and now, be it further

Resolved, That the presiding officers of each house of the Legislature of the State of Arizona are hereby directed to forward to the President of the United States and the presiding officers of the Senate and the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States and to the United States Senators and the Representatives in Congress for Arizona a copy of this memorial.

Adopted by the senate by vote of 18 ayes, 1 excused.

M. G. CUNNIFF,
President of the Senate.

May 16, 1912, passed the house by vote of 32 ayes, 1 no, 2 absent.

SAM B. BRADNER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I realize that there is little use in speaking at this time when Senators are not in their seats, because the only reason for making any remarks now would be to convince somebody of the opinion which the speaker might hold.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I would rather not have that suggestion made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am not asking for a quorum myself; but if the Senator from Nevada insists upon it, I will yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think, Mr. President, that as we are about to act upon this important bill the Senate should be assembled. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Crane	Jones	Pomerene
Bacon	Cullom	Kern	Sanders
Bankhead	Dillingham	La Follette	Shively
Borah	du Pont	Lodge	Simmons
Bourne	Fletcher	McLean	Smith, Ga.
Bradley	Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Gronna	Massey	Smoot
Bryan	Heyburn	Myers	Sutherland
Burnham	Hitchcock	Newlands	Thornton
Burton	Johnson, Me.	Page	Townsend
Chamberlain	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-three Senators have answered to their names, not a quorum. Without objection, the names of the Senators not responding will be called.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. LIPPITT, Mr. GUGGENHEIM, Mr. FALL, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. CATRON, Mr. RAYNER, Mr. CRAWFORD, Mr. BAILEY, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. WATSON, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. WILLIAMS responded to their names.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is unexpectedly and unavoidably absent from the Chamber on important public business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names; a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I do not recall the passage of the pending bill. It has been frequently said to-day that it was passed unanimously through this body and I assume that to be true; but I am sure, therefore, that it must have passed under unanimous consent and without discussion—at least no discussion of this measure occurred while I was in the Senate. I knew nothing about it prior to what I have heard said and what I have discovered to-day. I have, however, learned something about the measure to-day, and some matters which have been undisputed lead me to believe that it is the duty of the Senate to sustain the President's veto of the bill.

According to the statement of the Secretary of the Interior and of the President, there are various matters affecting the bond now in dispute and in process of settlement, which the passage of this bill would terminate, and such termination would be detrimental to the Government. If this bill passes not even $42,000 may be collected on the bond, and then neither these claimants nor the Government recover anything.

There is another thing which I think is practically settled, and that is that whatever is allowed under this bill, whatever is recovered under this suit by these claimants against the bond, must be eventually carried over to the settler, and I do not think that is just or right. The settlers on these irrigation lands are quite as poor and quite as much entitled to the consideration of Congress as are the merchants who are holding claims.

As for me, if it became a question of doing an injustice to these tradesmen or to the innocent settler, I should be quite inclined to favor the latter in preference to the others; and for this reason: We all understand something of the nature of the claims that are presented in cases of this kind. If I understood the Senator from Montana correctly, these pay checks of workmen were cashed by these small dealers, as he calls them—by the merchants—and undoubtedly they were paid for out of the store, which necessarily included a profit to the dealer in exchanging his goods for their checks.

It is also clear to my mind that an unusual profit—because I am simply judging from analogy, from similar cases—undoubtedly went to the dealer. I say, therefore, if it comes to a matter of doing an injustice, if one has to be done, either to the settler who buys his land with the understanding that he is to pay the legitimate cost of the irrigation or an injustice to these men who are thriving through trade on this kind of a project, I am going to favor the settler if I can.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the Senator allow me to finish this sentence? I have not quite completed my proposition.

Now, I am in perfect sympathy with the idea that if an injustice has been committed by reason of any act of unwisdom or of ignorance on the part of the Government, then the Government should make good the loss which it has imposed upon the people who have dealt with it and relied upon the good faith and the judgment of the Government of the United States in the transaction.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield, now.

Mr. MYERS. I call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to these lines on page 3 of the Secretary's report. I will read them:

> As to the 22,000 acres, the existing contracts, so long as they are fulfilled by the water users, are binding upon the United States. This fact precludes the shifting of any of the burden from the laborers and material men to water users on said 22,000 acres.

If it may be that any of this cost may be taxable to the lands under this project which are not yet taken, does the Senator see any harm in any settler ascertaining the amount to be taxed to the land per acre under the project, knowing what it would be, believing the land would be worth it, entering into a contract to pay the price, doing it with his eyes open, and knowing what he was doing? Do you see any objection to that?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I see very great objection. I not only read that clause, but I read further, where the Secretary states that the burdens already placed on these lands are as much as men can bear who are going to take up the property; that if the burdens of the settlers are increased, this project will not be used; the land will not be settled.

I take it that when the Government embarked in these irrigation projects it was for the purpose of doing somebody some good. It was for the purpose of opening up land which otherwise could not be used, but would remain desert, in order that it might go into use and help to supply the country with the food it needs. Any project of irrigation entered upon by the United States is supposedly intended for the use of the people—poor people.

I also recognize that while these 22,000 acres might possibly be relieved, the balance of the land would have to bear the burden.

Mr. MYERS. I would ask the Senator this further question: The Senator bears in mind that the increase per acre, if it should be taxed on at all, is less than $1 per acre. I want him to bear that in mind.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understand that the minimum burden, according to this, would be $19.80 on a farm of 60 acres.

Mr. MYERS. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And the maximum is $54.60. Those are not small items to a poor and struggling farmer on these lands.

Mr. MYERS. I will call attention to the closing sentence of the Secretary's communication:

> Under these circumstances I am reluctantly compelled to advise that the bill should not receive your approval. If the lands of the project were able to bear the additional charge, I would gladly advise otherwise.

I would ask the Senator if these remaining lands are not able to bear the additional charge; does he think that statement indicates the intention of the Department of the Interior to put the charge on the additional lands which they have not sold, and which could not bear it? Would he attempt to do an impossible and a vain and a futile thing?

Mr. TOWNSEND. There is nothing clearer to my mind than that that is the intention of the department. The land would pay the extra charge if it is occupied.

Mr. MYERS. Then ruin the whole project, because of the finding of no takers.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think the department would have the right to do anything else. Under this bill I do not believe the Government would have any right to pay this except as it imposed it back on the land.

Mr. President, there is a direct way of getting at this, and I have very little sympathy with either the object or the argument of the Senator from Montana when he suggests that this Congress is going to deal differently in the case of a banker than in the case of these poor people, as he calls them. I do not recall the Bellefourche case when it was up in the Senate—it probably was considered before I entered the Senate—but I can see a great difference in principle there, notwithstanding that Senators wiser than I say the principle is the same. In that case there was a written contract entered into under a mutual mistake. We could do nothing less than remedy that mistake, but if I could have had my way about it and had been present I then would have insisted that a separate bill should have been introduced, the money payable out of the Treasury, to make good the mistake that had been made and that it should not have been imposed upon the settler.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Michigan says when this contract was entered into there was a mutual mistake. Notwithstanding the fact that every man is presumed to know the law, the department did not know the law, and therefore they entered into that contract; but that the people who were dealing with that contract and who were furnishing money, and so forth, under the contract were bankers, business men who had an opportunity to know just as well as anyone else what the law was, and must be dealt with with the same presumption against them that they did know the law and had the opportunity in fact to know.

Mr. TOWNSEND. There is no question about that.

Mr. BORAH. Was there equity in that case, where keen business men were involved, and none here, where laborers and those not so well advised are involved?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator from Idaho claim for a moment that they believed that the law of 1894 was in effect and they were both laboring under a misapprehension?

Mr. BORAH. Perhaps not, or at least admit it, but they had a right to believe that the United States Government was in a position to protect those people by proper bonds and contracts by which what the Government got the Government would pay for. That is a matter every citizen has the right to assume as against the Government. I will admit that it ought to be dissipated pretty soon if this bill does not pass.

Mr. TOWNSEND. There was no allegation anywhere that there was any mistake on the part of any of the parties to this contract.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the hearings both in the House and in the Senate show that these people who bought the time checks, these people who trusted the laborers for their groceries, and furnished material, did believe that the law of 1894 was still in force.

Mr. MYERS. Just a word, if the Senator please.

Mr. CUMMINS. And they would not have given them credit at all if they had not believed that the Government would take care of them by allowing them the first right on the bond. I think the hearings show those facts.

Mr. MYERS. Just one moment, if the Senator will permit.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I should like to answer——

Mr. MYERS. It was shown that the law of 1894 was thought still in effect and protected them, and it was repealed only a few weeks before.

Mr. TOWNSEND. These claimants were not a party to the contract—not one of them.

Mr. CUMMINS. Neither was the banker in South Dakota a party to the contract.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; but I am saying that the parties to that contract were both laboring under a misapprehension of the law, and it was a mutual mistake that it was assented to; that it was made or entered into at the time when it was legal, but——

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Michigan is mistaken about that. There is no suggestion that the departmental officers who made the contract were ignorant of the law. Of course they were not ignorant of the law. The truth is, as I infer, that they used a blank which had been well fitted for the case before the repeal of the act of 1894, but which was unfitted for the situation after the repeal of that law. Neither the contractor nor the department was ignorant of the law. I think it might very well be inferred that the bank which advanced the money was ignorant of the change in the law, because I fancy very few people knew the law had been changed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The only reason I suggest why the Government and the other party were ignorant of the law is because they signed a contract which in express terms was contrary to the law. Therefore I say that I assume that they did that and that they were on equal terms—the two parties to that contract.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the law of 1905 was passed at the instance of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. TOWNSEND. There is no doubt at all about that. I am speaking about the contract entered into, which was a clear violation of existing law or under a law that had been repealed by another act. I think that if in that case, as I said before, this extra charge, $20,000, was carried over to the landholders, it was a mistake to do it—in that case the same as in this case.

Furthermore, Mr. President, as I started to say in answer to the Senator from Montana, when he charges that one was a case of a banker and the other that of poor men, that the parties or their financial conditions have absolutely nothing to do with this case. I do not think anybody will charge that a distinction is attempted to be made here because one was a banker and the other was a storekeeper.

Mr. BORAH. No; but it results that the suggestion is true. We do not intend to do that. We have no idea of making that distinction, but it so comes about that it is made.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator from Idaho think there is a man in the Senate who is governed by that idea or influenced by it at all?

Mr. BORAH. I do not desire to modify my statement or to enlarge my statement further than to say that, while none of us intend to do it, we so legislate that it happens to be done.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Personally I have become very tired of this kind of insinuation—something brought into a case for the purpose of appealing to prejudice rather than to reason. The Senate is constantly at work, as it ought to be at work, doing justice to poor people, granting and passing claims carrying thousands of dollars to aid people who are in distress who have no claim against the Government at all. I have never voted against a bill that I thought had merit in it that was founded on justice or equity or right. If it can be proved that these storekeepers actually paid out the money on these claims—and I insist that that is a matter which ought to be determined, and would be if it was a question standing alone—if that could be determined, I would be very glad, indeed, to vote money out of the Treasury to reimburse these people for what they lost or had to pay.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is the Senator from Michigan familiar with the hearings on this bill?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am not. I just looked them over a little bit this morning. The first time I ever heard of this case in detail was when it was brought up in the Senate to-day.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may, then, without offense, advise the Senator from Michigan that the very fact which he suggested ought to be proven, was proved over and over again in the hearings.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then that step would not have to be taken. But that does not modify my position at all. I said if the claim was just or had been established or could be established I would vote to pay it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may say again that these poor people wanted it done in that way. They asked the Government under all the circumstances to reimburse them, and the committee refused to consider that proposition at all, believing that this was the way in which it should be done.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What committee?

Mr. CUMMINS. The committee to which it was referred.

Mr. MYERS. The House Committee on Irrigation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Was it ever presented to the Senate Committee on Claims?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know. I think not.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I know the bill never was presented to that committee at a time when I was present.

Mr. CUMMINS. The other committee has just as keen a sense of justice as has the Committee on Claims, and that was the original idea, that they should be reimbursed in that way; but, following the advice of the members of the committee to which the bill was referred, this course has been taken by these people, and now it is proposed, because that advice was followed and the bill appears in this form, to turn them out with the suggestion that at some future time they can get before the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I insist it is the proposition to shift the burden from some storekeepers out in the western country to the landholders—the people there who have been buying the land under this project—and they would have to bear the burden instead of the others.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is not the proposition at all.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think it is.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is utterly impossible under the law that that shall be the result. This additional assessment can only be made upon those lands to which as yet no right whatsoever has been granted or in which no right has accrued.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is an admission of the correctness of my contention, that the lands have to pay it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then, I suppose the Senator from Michigan is willing to adopt the policy that the United States must dispose of its public resources at cost. Is he willing to dispose of all of the public resources at cost, as he seems to desire to dispose of this particular piece of land at cost?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not quite understand the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. What I mean is this——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to state to the Senator that I do not understand him.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then, I may repeat a little of what I said this morning.

This project was intended to irrigate, and it was estimated that it would irrigate, 150,000 acres of land. Twenty-two thousand acres of that area have been entered and sold; contracts have been made with men concerning 22,000 acres.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understand that.

Mr. CUMMINS. And there is no suggestion that any part of this increased cost shall be assessed against the 22,000 acres sold or entered. One hundred and twenty-eight thousand acres remain. It is a part of the public domain. The Government owns it, and I suppose it is its business to sell it at a fair profit. That is the general policy of the Government.

Does the Senator from Michigan perceive any injustice in taking the real cost of this project and apportioning it upon the 128,000 acres, holding the land out to the world and saying, "Come, if you want to buy this land at this price; we will sell it to you; but if you do not want to buy the land at this price, you need not." Who is injured by that proceeding?

Now, let me say further, because I know the Senator from Michigan wants to be just, this project has cost the Government all this money. The $42,000 represented here by the beneficiaries of this bill was put into this project—their material went into this project. When the Government took possession of the work, took it from the contractor, there was on the ground a part of the material represented in this sum of money, and it was taken by the Government and used by the Government in the further construction of the tunnel. The project is fairly worth all that has been paid by the Government.

The real truth is that nobody is to blame here especially. I do not criticize the Government officials save in taking an inadequate bond; but the real truth is that there was a mistake as to the character of the earth at the point through which this tunnel passes, and the contractor took the contract believing it was of one kind, but it turned out to be another. What the Government agreed to pay him for it was not enough to compensate him for doing it.

Therefore as he went along with the work he could not pay for his material, he could not pay his labor, he could not pay for supplies out of the money which the Government had agreed to pay him. There should have been in the contract, of course, a provision which would have protected the contractor in the event of the discovery of different material, which was more expensive to take out of the tunnel, but there was not.

Now, does the Senator from Michigan believe that under those circumstances a man who goes in next year or the year after and takes a farm upon this project can do it in good conscience when he is using and utilizing the material and the supplies and the labor for which no payment has ever been made? I do not think that is equitable. I do not believe the Senator from Michigan will believe it to be equitable.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have spoken with poor results if I have not convinced the Senator from Iowa and the Senate that I am not contending for any such proposition as he has stated. I have insisted that the Government should pay for this extra cost.

The Senator asked me if there is anything wrong in having the men who are going to take up these claims pay this extra cost or the pro rata share, whatever it may be. As I said to the Senator from Montana, the Government undertook this project of irrigation on the theory that it was going to furnish opportunities for farming which could be taken advantage of by the settlers. The Secretary states here that the engineer of the Reclamation Service advises that the water-right charge already imposed and to be imposed upon the lands in this project, in view of the nature and value of the land, now is at the maximum of safety.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I suggest, if that is true and this is put upon the land, then there will happen what the Senator from Michigan thinks ought to happen, namely, the loss will be borne by the Government of the United States, for if no one comes there to buy, it will remain the property of the United States.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Of course, and not be used.

Mr. CUMMINS. And not be used.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And the very object for irrigation will have been defeated.

Now, if there are certain legitimate charges that ought to have been imposed, and then through some mistake, either through a failure to understand the nature of the soil through which this tunnel must be constructed or anything else, that would have made the project unreasonable to start with and possibly, therefore, it would never have been undertaken, that contingency should be met by the Government and should not be loaded upon this project, or upon the men who are going to take advantage of it, or might take advantage of it. Else it will not be used, and the object and the whole expenditure will thus become worthless. It would result in an extravagant waste of money, because it can never be utilized.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then the remedy is with Congress.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Sure.

Mr. CUMMINS. Congress can immediately say that the land shall be sold at one-half of the cost. Congress has it all in its own hands.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It has; but the Senator's remedy is not a specific. Mr. President, there is another element to which I wish to call attention very briefly—and I have spoken now longer than I expected. I have been on the Committee on Claims of the Senate long enough to understand that whenever anybody enters into a contract with the Government and fails the Government is asked to reimburse him, to make him good. That is a very common thing which we experience here in Congress, and especially in the Committee on Claims.

I take it there must have been some good reason for changing the law of 1894 by the act of 1905; and yet, now that we have a law giving the Government priority to the provisions of a bond over other claimants, we propose to set that law aside and to open the door to every contractor, who would neglect to pay for his labor and material, knowing that the Government would pay these bills, and he be permitted to evade the provisions of the contract which he so eagerly sought and obtained. I think it is a very good plan to adhere to a contract and to observe the law. The contract should be a just one; but once made, its provisions should be enforced. I believe this is a wise course for the Government to follow. No one is wise enough to foretell what serious effects may flow from the passage of the pending bill. It will establish a precedent which may arise many times to plague us. If these claimants have suffered injury, and the Government, through its agents, is responsible for that injury, let a bill be introduced and compensation rendered out of the United States Treasury; but do not punish innocent people, who are quite as poor as these claimants, by shifting this burden upon them. If we are going to be generous with the people's money and property, let us at least be equitable in its distribution.

I submit, Mr. President, that for these and other reasons the President's veto should be sustained.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement in reference to the matter. I desire to call attention to the fact that the Government is not entirely free from blame in this matter, and I want to prove that fact by a statement from the project engineer himself.

In the first place, the contractor was governed a good deal by the plans and specifications as prepared by the Government engineers. In the very nature of things he could not examine into the condition of the soil where this tunnel was built, and because the contractor found conditions very different from those mentioned in the plans and specifications he was put to a very much larger expense than would have ordinarily been the case.

The supervising engineer, Mr. H. N. Savage, called upon the project engineer at this particular tunnel for a statement as to conditions with reference to the tunnel after the contractors had failed, and in reply to Mr. Savage, the supervising engineer, Mr. Sellew, the project engineer, called attention to the fact that surface elevations over the tunnel line taken in August, 1906, by the Government engineers varied materially from those indicated on the drawings. He called attention to the fact that while the Government engineers had estimated that there was no water in the tunnel, when the contractor got to work he found there was water in the tunnel, and it necessitated putting in pumps.

In addition to that, the Government engineers compelled the contractors to make a variation in the tunnel itself, compelling them to lower it a good deal at the lower end of the tunnel over the plans and specifications, and about this the contractor could not say a word.

In the conclusion of his statement to the supervising engineer he makes a statement in his letter which I will read. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact because there were Government officials there after the Government had completed the work who stated that the Government ought to treat these contractors justly under the circumstances, as they had found conditions very different from the reports made by the Government engineers. Here is what Mr. Sellew says:

> I have attempted to merely call attention to the several points above, and as you are so familiar with the details, elaboration on my part is unnecessary. From our conversation at Cheyenne I inferred that in the final adjustment of the Corbett contract the Government would approach the subject from all sides, and the claims of the contractor would receive careful attention. I certainly hope that such is the case, for I am firmly convinced that the conditions at Corbett were no more anticipated by the engineers than by the contractor, and it would be unfair to charge up to the contractor the cost of difficulties that he had no means of foreseeing and which the surveys and investigations of the Government failed to develop.

This letter is dated December 9, 1907, showing that the project engineer himself recognized that the contractor had not been treated with entire fairness, and in dealing with him upon the subject it ought to be taken as evidence of the fact that the contractors had taken the work at a very much lower cost than they ought to have undertaken it; that after the Government took charge of it, although the contractors agreed to do the work for something like $550,000, it cost the Government of the United States nearly $200,000 more to complete the work. Still it is insisted that the Government is entirely free from blame.

I am simply calling attention to this to show that the Government itself through its proper officers there admitted that they had been guilty of some carelessness and through this carelessness the contractor had been measurably misled.

Mr. NEWLANDS obtained the floor.

Mr. MYERS. I wish to make a request.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I understand that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] had given notice that he would deliver an address to-day. I was not aware of that when this matter ran over the morning hour. I do not wish to interfere at all with his notice, and I now ask that the consideration of this bill and the Presidential veto thereof go over until the morning hour to-morrow, subject to be called up and the consideration thereof to be resumed at that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of Michigan in the chair). The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent——

Mr. SMOOT. Is it the request that the bill shall be taken up immediately after the conclusion of the morning business?

Mr. MYERS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Before that is done I should like to ask——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah will permit the Chair to state the request. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the measure now before the Senate and the veto message shall be laid aside and be taken up to-morrow at the close of the morning business.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply wish to say that I shall move immediately afterwards, if that is agreed to, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it shall adjourn to meet to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none, and that course will be taken.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 127) authorizing the Secretary of War to supply tents and rations to American citizens compelled to leave Mexico, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20728) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, Mr. CARTER, and Mr. BURKE of South Dakota managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

H. R. 16518. An act for the relief of the Fifth-Third National Bank of Cincinnati, Ohio; and

H. R. 18041. An act granting a franchise for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a street railway system in the district of South Hilo, county of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii.

RELIEF OF AMERICAN CITIZENS AT EL PASO, TEX.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 127) authorizing the Secretary of War to supply tents and rations to American citizens compelled to leave Mexico, which were, on page 1, line 3, after "authorized," to insert, "to expend not to exceed the sum of $20,000 out of any unexpended balance of the money appropriated for the Mississippi flood sufferers May 9, 1912"; on page 1, line 5, to strike out "all"; and on page 1, line 7, after "who," to insert, "have no other means of obtaining shelter and food and."

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20728) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CLAPP. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. GAMBLE, Mr. CLAPP, and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

Mr. BAILEY. In view of the fact that it is difficult to get Senators here at 11 o'clock, I think that ought not to be done unless there is some good reason for it. If there is a special reason, I will make no objection; but the roll has to be called to get a quorum here even at 11 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. It is evident that it is going to take some more time to discuss the question which has been before the Senate, and I understand there are no committees specially that meet to-morrow.

Mr. BAILEY. To what question does the Senator refer?

Mr. SMOOT. To the veto message of the President.

Mr. BAILEY. It might be better to save the time and pay the money.

Mr. SMOOT. That may be true. I know the matter is going to be discussed for some time yet. I understand that the Post Office appropriation bill has not yet been presented to the Senate. The chairman of the committee would like to present it to-morrow, but he would not like to present it before 12 o'clock.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the motion of the Senator from Utah and will then recognize the Senator from Iowa. The Senator from Utah moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet to-morrow at 10 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. I am informed that there are certain meetings which have been appointed for to-morrow morning in which Senators on the other side are interested. Therefore I will modify the motion and make it 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CUMMINS. While I will not make any objection to the modification as proposed, I believe we ought to meet at 10 o'clock from now until the close of the session. There are some of us who are getting tired of staying here, and we want to dispatch the business that is to be done as quickly as possible.

Mr. BAILEY. Let us hold night sessions, then.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am perfectly willing to hold night sessions. I am sure of only one thing, and that is that we ought to give more hours to the business in hand if we are to get away within any reasonable time.

The Senator from Texas says that it will be hard to secure a quorum at 10 o'clock. It is hard to secure a quorum at 3 o'clock in the afternoon. We have but a dozen Senators or so who stay here all the time. We might as well do business with them at 10 o'clock in the morning as at 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Utah that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, we can generally find a quorum in the cloak room. Senators are in hailing distance. I am perfectly willing myself to come at 11 and adjourn at 5 and come back at 8, but there is not a Senator in the body who can come here for two weeks at 10 o'clock and stay until 5 or 6 and escape a headache toward the close of every session. This room is built on the principle of a jail, anyway; it is a building within a building; the ventilation is bad; and five hours steadily are as long as any man can remain in this Chamber.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree to all that. While it may be that the ventilation is bad and the room is bad, a certain number of hours must be spent here in order to do the business we must transact; and it seems to me it does not make any difference whether it is from 10 to 6 or from 11 until later in the evening.

Mr. BAILEY. The difference is this: If we convene at 11, recess at 6, and come back at 8, we have two hours during which we go about our several ways and come back to the Chamber more or less refreshed.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am perfectly willing for any disposition of the hours of the day. I do know that we must spend here more hours than we have been spending or we will spend the summer and the fall.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Utah that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Utah that we have a Democratic caucus which meets to-morrow morning at 10. I am satisfied from having attended those caucuses and from the disposition to speak at them that its work will not be concluded by 11.

Mr. SMOOT. Will not one hour be sufficient?

Mr. SWANSON. It will not be sufficient. It usually takes a day for a Republican caucus, but we usually get through in two hours. I suggest that the Senator make the hour of meeting to-morrow 12 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. I really think it would not inconvenience Senators to meet at 11 o'clock. If we are going to get through with the business of the session and get away at any time in the early part of August, I really believe we shall have either to begin meeting at 10 o'clock or to hold night sessions, and so that there may be no misunderstanding and no complaint about it, I give notice now that I shall ask the Senate, day after to-morrow, to begin meeting at 10 o'clock or else hold night sessions, and let the Senate decide the question.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not think it has ever happened in the history of the Senate that there has been a disposition to interfere with the convenience of the entire body of Senators on one side of the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if he feels that 11 o'clock is too early to meet to-morrow?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do. I would rather have the Senate meet at 12 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I am perfectly willing to hold a session to-morrow night.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am perfectly willing, as far as I am concerned, to meet to-morrow night, and to meet at any hour that is convenient to Senators on the following day.

Mr. BORAH. With the understanding that we shall have a session to-morrow night, I will not oppose the proposition to meet to-morrow at 12. Otherwise I shall oppose it.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I will withdraw the motion, so that when we adjourn to-day we shall meet at the usual hour to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah withdraws his motion.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. So far as a night session is concerned, I expressed only my individual opinion. I do not want any Senators to assume that there will be no opposition to a night session. I say that for myself personally it is entirely agreeable to me. That is all I meant to say.

HIGH PRICES AND HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, on the 20th of this month I gave notice that to-day I should address the Senate on the subject of high prices and the high cost of living. The discussion of the bill vetoed by the President has taken a great deal of the time, and I am obliged to the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] for yielding to me.

I wish to ask consent to print in the RECORD divers tables and other material with which I do not desire to detain the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request of the Senator from Ohio will be granted unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURTON. I am also anxious that I shall not be interrupted during my address. When I am through I shall be very glad to answer any inquiries which may be propounded.

HIGH PRICES.

Among existing causes of popular discontent none is more prominent than the prevalent high cost of living. This phenomenon is plainly in evidence, but the reasons given for its existence include an infinite variety. Tariff laws, fiscal policies, dominant political parties, gold production, the trusts, Wall Street, Congress, the exactions of middlemen, and the grasping disposition of merchants, manufacturers, and others, are all indiscriminately blamed for present conditions.

It is evident that not all of these conflicting explanations can be correct and that in seeking the causes of these economic tendencies many prevalent opinions are likely to be erroneous. In each of the last four decades there have been periods of approximately five years in which prices varied materially from the normal level. In the last decade high prices were the feature. In the first three, beginning with 1871, 1881, and 1891, respectively, complaint rested upon low prices. In explaining this condition there was the same contrariety of opinions.

In referring to prevalent low prices and slackened trade in 1878, Prof. Jevons says:

> It is curious to notice the variety of explanations offered by commercial writers concerning the cause of the present state of trade. Foreign competition, beer drinking, overproduction, trades-unionism, war, peace, want of gold, superabundance of silver, Lord Beaconsfield, Sir Stafford Northcote, their extravagant expenditures, the Government policy, the Glasgow Bank directors, Mr. Edison and the electric light, are a few of the happy and consistent suggestions continually made to explain the present disastrous collapse of industry and credit.

It is the aim of this inquiry to ascertain, if possible, the actual causes for the high prices which now prevail. Are there not far-reaching influences controlling sowing and reaping, production and distribution, influences antecedent to and governing the disposition and methods of manufacturers, merchants, business men, and laborers, which are responsible for the phenomena of to-day? It is with the conviction that such is the case that I shall endeavor to set forth certain fundamental facts which adequately account for the situation and eliminate from consideration certain explanations of the course of prices which are manifestly fallacious. At the outset the great general fact must be recognized that the high cost of living is plainly manifest among all advanced nations and approximately in proportion to the degree of progress each has made along industrial and commercial lines. The countries in which the phenomenon attracts least attention are those which are least advanced in civilization.

Reasoning from general principles, it is inevitable that this must be the case. In a time of progress, when invention is furnishing every few years some new implement or facility, there is a constant demand for each successive novelty, and as a result increased expenditure, extravagance, and higher prices must ensue. Progress in European countries and in localities in Asia and Africa, where European influence has been felt, though less marked, has been similar to that in our own. The same results must follow this progress—increased consumption, unequal production of different commodities, and tendencies toward waste and extravagance. The general principles are amply sustained by a recital of actual prices.

In a single newspaper published in Paris last September, there were paragraphs giving accounts of meetings in Berlin, Switzerland, Bohemia, Silesia, and Galicia to protest against high prices, some of which were attended by violence. In other papers about the same time there were paragraphs giving accounts of bread riots in France and of loud complaints against the high cost of living in England and Belgium.

I subjoin as an appendix a list of extracts from reports of American consular officers abroad, together with tables of price ranges in various foreign cities, gathered and compiled by Mr. O. P. Austin, of the Bureau of Statistics, Department of Commerce and Labor, a few of which I will quote.

These reports all point in one direction—rising prices in the British Isles, in Germany, in France, in Spain, and elsewhere. In this latter country the consul at Valencia states:

> There is much popular dissatisfaction with the high cost of foodstuffs in Spain.

The consul at Malaga says:

> The problem of greatly increased cost of living is as acute here as in the United States. All the necessities of life have gone up steadily in price, and there does not seem to be any immediate relief.

It will be noted that the consul at Patras, in Greece, says:

> The same amount of money expended by a family per annum in Greece and the United States would secure in the latter country a larger degree of the comforts and luxuries of life than in the former.

In Italy, the consul general at Genoa says:

> The past few years have witnessed a general increase in the cost of living throughout Italy.

The consul at Milan says:

> In no place in Italy is the increased cost of living more keenly felt than in Milan. The price of meat is steadily increasing. House rents have advanced 30 per cent in three years.

The consul general at Vienna states:

In common with the rest of the world, Austria has been affected by the increased cost of living, and complaints are made on every hand. Unrest over the increased cost of living showed itself in a nation-wide protest against the price of meat.

The consul at Reichenberg states:

In all parts of Austria meetings have been held recently to protest against the continuous advance in prices of all kinds of foodstuffs. Prices had advanced so rapidly in all food products as to have the effect of creating most distressing conditions.

The consul general at Moscow states:

The increased cost of living throughout Russia is perhaps felt more keenly in Moscow than in any other city of the Empire. Conditions have become so serious that many plans have been mooted for the relief of the people.

He shows, by tables giving the prices of meats, that some grades have doubled in cost, while there has been a general advance in food products of 20 per cent, and often much more, in the five years from 1903 to 1908.

The increase extends to China, where the consul at Nanking says:

It is a matter of grave concern to observe from year to year the increasing cost of living which, of course, includes every item of household expenses.

The consul generals in Japan say that the increase in the cost of living is even more marked than in China. The consul general at Yokohama says:

During July and August, 1911, the price of rice on the Tokyo rice and other grain exchanges advanced to nearly $2 per bushel, a price never before reached in Japan.

The consul general at Kobe says:

According to an article in a Japanese newspaper, prices have gone up in Japan over twofold in the last 20 years—and he states that the Japanese rate of advance has been greater than that in London or New York.

The same phenomenon is apparent in Syria, where the consul reports that outside of a few staple articles, such as coffee, sugar, petroleum, and a few others of less importance, the cost of living has increased 20 to 50 per cent within the past year. Prices of meats have risen over 30 per cent, and butter in proportion. Household servants and similar employees demand from 50 to 75 per cent more than formerly.

The consul at Harput, in Asia Minor, says:

One of the inexplicable things in connection with this country is the remarkable increase in the price of everything, and there is not one article that goes into any of the relations of life that has not almost doubled in price during the past five years.

The consul at Port Elizabeth, Cape Colony, South Africa, says:

The cost of living in Port Elizabeth is high and would equal that of American cities of equal size.

As regards the comparative cost of living of wage earners in Europe and the United States, President Gompers, of the American Federation of Labor, said in an article printed in the American Federationist for January, 1910:

Mentally contemplating the many cities I visited, and having in mind the conversations I had with workingmen who had lived both in Europe and America, I believe I may assert that whether the cost of living in Europe or America is greater to the workingman depends entirely upon the standard of living he adopts while in America. If he voluntarily lives the life of self-denial in this country that he compulsorily lived in his native land his outlay in money will remain about the same. Even then he will hardly be able to escape gaining something from the superior quality of the good things of life in America.

Living is cheap to the wageworker in Europe only because he does without what in America soon becomes a necessity to him—food in good quantity and quality, presentable clothes among his aspiring fellow countrymen and their families, and a comfortably furnished home in quarters responding to his awakened desires and freer life. * * * Fine wool and silk stuffs, furs, laces, and kid gloves cost less abroad than in the United States, a fact, however, which bears as lightly in an inquiry into the conditions of the masses as does the tariff on the masterpieces of art. * * * The main conclusion as to housing is the same as that relating to food: If the immigrant to this country is willing to continue living here at the same level he was obliged to accept in his native land, he can find it for the same money.

So far as we have data, the same phenomena of high prices were in evidence in earlier times in the most progressive and civilized countries. In those days increased resources were partly obtained by the spoils of conquered provinces, which in a measure supplied the increased wealth afforded by the industrial and commercial progress of modern times.

Mr. Boeckh, the German economist, who made a study of finance in Greece, states that in the time of Solon an ox in Athens cost 5 drachmas, or about 85 cents; a sheep, 1 drachma, or 17 cents; a bushel and 3 gallons of corn, the same. Two hundred years later, after the marvelous progress made by the Athenians, prices rose to 5 times, and in many cases to 10 or 20 times, their former amount. In addition to the spoil obtained by successful military operations, progress was made in mining in the islands of the Mediterranean, in Attica itself, and in Thrace and the island of Thasos. In Rome it is more difficult to trace the changes in prices of food. Corn was sometimes exacted as a tribute from conquered countries and sold by the state at less than cost, or even given away. Cattle and corn, however, increased in price. About 400 B. C. sheep sold for about 17 cents each. At the date of the Christian era the price was the equivalent of $6.25. The Romans, like the Athenians, gained wealth from the spoil of conquered countries and acquired gold and silver from their mines. After the Punic wars mines were obtained from the Carthaginians in the western part of Africa, in Sicily, in Sardinia, and the south of Spain. At a later time the mines of Greece and Asia Minor, and still later the mines of Macedonia and Thrace, came into the possession of the Romans.

It is to be noted that with the decline and fall of the Empire in the year 476 A. D., there was a lapse, if not into barbarism, at least into less civilized conditions; prices fell and industrial activity and the mining of the precious metals declined.

In referring to these conditions Mr. Jacobs, in his excellent history of the Precious Metals, says:

In this period from about 480 to 670 or 680 the greatest diligence has been able to discover no trace in any author of the operations of mining having been carried on.

Such operations are alike suspended or less productive of results in less progressive periods and in time of war and political disturbance.

Mr. Jacobs also says:

When the Mahometan power arose, its aspect was sufficiently terrific to continue the suspension of the mines. The precious metals were sought not by exploring the bowels of the earth, but by the more summary process of conquest, tribute, and plunder.

There is extant a dialogue which was printed in England in the year 1581, attributed to one W. S., afterwards reprinted about the year 1751 by an enterprising publisher, and ascribed to William Shakespeare, a manifest effort to obtain a greater sale by deceit. Careful examination of contemporaneous facts shows that this interesting dialogue occurred in the year 1549, when England was beginning to feel the effect of the great awakening which followed the discovery of America, the invention of printing, and other great advances in civilization. The participants in the dialogue are a knight or owner of land, supposed to be Mr. Thomas Hales; a doctor of divinity, who, as it is conjectured, was Bishop Hugh Latimer; a husbandman; a tenant farmer; a merchant; a mercer; and a capper. This document is exceedingly valuable for students who are considering the subject of high prices, for if we leave out the influence of the larger aggregations of capital and the characteristic features of modern business, practically every reason for a rise in prices is advanced in it. Each ascribed the responsibility for the existing situation to faults related to the occupation of the other. Views are expressed upon the benefits of protective tariffs against foreign products, upon the balance of trade, upon the exactions of the middleman, upon the increase in rents of agricultural land. One of the participants in the dialogue expresses the opinion that avarice is the cause of high prices. Another enumerates the great increase in the cost of necessary articles and says:

Within these eight years you could buy the best pig or goose that I could lay my hands upon for 4 pence, which now costs me 8 pence, and a good capon for 3 pence or 4, a chicken for a penny, a hen for 2, which will now cost me double the money, and it is likewise of great ware as of mutton and of beef.

A subject which has received much modern discussion as to whether price determines rent or rent price was treated in the dialogue. It was maintained that price determined rent, and not rent price. One cause of the increase of prices which was pointed out in this dialogue is the clipping of coin, which caused the good coins to go abroad for use in foreign trade. There were, however, more universal causes than this. Bodin, a French political philosopher of the last half of the sixteenth century, states, as an undoubted fact, that there had been a revolution in prices. He gives six reasons for it:

(1) The great abundance of gold and silver, which resulted in a decrease in its purchasing power. The discovery of America and the increase of commerce and the development of banks caused the great abundance.

(2) The monopolies of the guilds and of the tax farmers.

(3) The ease with which wine and corn—the chief products of France at that time—might be exported, thus increasing the price at home.

(4) The extravagance of the court.
(5) The general leisure in the community.
(6) The debasement of money, a practice which was prevalent in France at that time.

These reasons, while perhaps not recognizing the great general fact of the demands of an advancing civilization, will bear the test of analysis to-day.

There are potent reasons why the increase in prices, and especially in the cost of living, should be greater in the United States than elsewhere:

(1) The unusually disproportionate growth of urban and rural population.
(2) The greater increase in average consumption.
(3) The higher scale of wages and higher standard of living.
(4) The temptation to overexpansion of industrial and commercial enterprises by reason of the abundance of natural resources.
(5) The pressing demand for capital and consequent high rates of interest.
(6) The exceptional opportunity for speculative trading always characteristic of new or comparatively new countries.

On examination I think it will appear that the prevailing high prices can be traced to three very manifest and important causes, the application of which to the present problem has in a measure been overlooked:

(1) The phenomenal progress of recent years.
(2) The striking inequality of this progress in different branches of human endeavor.
(3) The inevitable tendencies in every progressive era to extravagance and waste in expenditure and to the diminished productive energy of a large share of the population.

The second and third causes are subordinate or incidental to the first and closely associated with each other. Let us examine the effect of each in its order:

(1) Progress: Notwithstanding long periods of inertia and even of retrogression the dominant note in the history of the race has been that of progress. This has been especially true in the last 100 years, or, to fix an exact date, since the close of the Napoleonic wars in the year 1815. Beginning at that time there has been a more peaceful disposition among nations. Human effort has been less occupied with warfare and more with the development and utilization of the world's resources. This has been accompanied by a constantly increasing development of commerce and industry, which has made its influence felt in both production and consumption. The advancing movement has gained in intensity in almost every successive decade. As ever, scientific progress has been in the van, followed by material, intellectual, and political progress. Science has given to mankind a constantly increasing control over nature. Inventions and discoveries have greatly multiplied the supply of useful articles adapted to satisfy human wants.

Modern means of communication by steamship and railroad, the readier transmission of news by telegraph, cable, and the wireless, the increasing scope of industrial and commercial enterprises and large-scale operations have all powerfully promoted a readier exchange of products within national borders and in international trade. It is now easy to obtain useful articles even from the remotest parts of the earth. More perfect means of communication, together with the diffusion of intelligence, have promoted political progress, the assertion of popular rights, and greater equality of opportunity, so that each individual may occupy a field of endeavor which was denied under the less favorable conditions which formerly existed.

One marked effect of this progress is the alleviation of the struggle for existence, with the resulting opportunity to acquire greater skill and to discover new methods of production. The requirement of less effort in obtaining the necessaries of life gives a wider scope to human enterprise, and makes it possible to multiply the achievements which contribute to the betterment of the race.

These factors have made possible a rising standard of living, which is the most striking feature of present-day civilization, especially here in America. As a result the conveniences and luxuries of one generation are regarded as necessities in the next. Wealth and the consequent enjoyment of conveniences and luxuries are no longer limited to the few. Even in humbler homes a standard of living is made possible which was beyond the fondest hope entertained by generations that have scarcely passed away. The resources of the world have been so developed that abundance is the possession of the most favored peoples, at least a relative abundance, for while many still suffer from the sting of poverty the great body of the people of the more progressive countries enjoy much larger opportunities and larger control over the comforts and necessaries of life. The environment of a refined civilization, as well as the opportunity for education and the wider scope afforded to human endeavor, kindle a desire for better conditions. They awaken new desires, create new wants, stimulate taste, and everywhere result in a demand that the higher aspirations of human nature be gratified. These tendencies are manifest in the general and growing demand for better houses, not only with ordinary facilities and comforts but with some of the luxuries; better clothing, involving quantity, texture, and particularly style; better food, more in quantity, greater in variety, and of superior quality. Along with these there is a desire for the wider outlook which is afforded by higher education, by the pleasures of social life, and an insistent demand for leisure and amusement.

As wealth accumulates in communities, a much larger share of the population withdraws partially or wholly from active or productive employment and gives attention to the gratification of personal tastes and desires. Within reasonable limits all these tendencies are a cause for felicitation rather than for regret. It should never be forgotten that, until a few years since, the most bitter complaints were uttered in periods of low prices. These were regarded as indicative of industrial depression and were accompanied by diminished employment. Legislation and administrative policies alike were blamed, sometimes most unjustly, because of the existence of a low price level. On the other hand, increased prices were very generally regarded as affording an impetus to business activity and promoting universal prosperity.

The statistics of per capita consumption are especially illuminating, notably in the case of food. Some tables prepared by Prof. Richmond Mayo-Smith, one of the ablest of our statisticians in the last decade of the last century, set forth clearly the increased consumption of divers articles in several countries of Europe in periods of about 20 to 25 years:

The census statistics of our own country show a marked increase in the consumption of such staple products as cotton, wool, wheat, corn, and sugar. The increase in consumption between the years 1890 and 1910 has been much greater than in production, with a resulting rise in prices. The increase from the period 1871–1880 to 1910 is even more striking, as shown by the tables following.

Expenditures for luxuries show an even more marked percentage of increase than in the case of the staple products of life. The importation of diamonds into the United States for the year 1890 was $11,928,030; for the year 1910 it was $39,772,678, or an increase of 233 per cent.

The automobile first came into practical use about the year 1900. It has a certain use from an economic standpoint in that it affords a ready means of transportation. Its effect in promoting health is not to be disparaged, but, for the most part, it is a luxury. The approximate number in actual use in the United States at the present time is probably between 400,000 and 500,000. The rapid growth of the automobile industry is readily seen from the steadily increasing annual output. As late as 1905 it is estimated that there were only 1,500 cars in use. In 1906 the production amounted to 25,000 cars; in 1907 to 45,000; in 1908 to 85,000; in 1909 to 110,000; in 1910 to 160,000; in 1911 to 190,000, with indications that in 1912 the number will reach 225,000. The total expenditure for American-made automobiles in the United States during 1911 was $240,000,000, or an amount about equal to the entire cost of conducting the Post Office Department for the same year. The expenditure for automobiles in this country since the inception of the business reaches the enormous total of $1,020,000,000.

NOTE.—All figures relative to the automobile industry were furnished by the editor of Motor. Figures in substantial agreement were also furnished by the Horseless Age.

The value of paintings and works of art imported for the year 1890 was $2,196,500, while for the year ending June 30, 1911, it was $22,190,053.

In a prosperous country where wealth is increasing there is a constant disposition to indulge in luxuries, often by those who can ill afford them. A new style of house or equipage or of dress, all of which are common in a time when wealth increases, frequently results in the discarding of that which under less favorable circumstances would be regarded as sufficient, and leads to the purchase of other articles in accordance with contemporaneous tastes or fashions. Social ambitions and the general desire for the enjoyment of pleasure tend in the same direction; extravagance grows as attractive objects multiply.

An important factor in the present high cost of living is the rapidly growing cost of government—national, State, and municipal. In case the proceeds derived from taxation are applied to essential improvements naturally no undue burden would result, but there are, nevertheless, manifest differences between public and private enterprises. The former are managed with a less degree of care and supervision. Given a certain object, the expense of securing it by public management is usually greater than under private control. There is a still more important factor. The aim and nature of public expenditures differ materially from private investments. The latter are made with a view to an adequate return, a profitable income on the amount expended; in many instances the former look to objects of a less essential nature, sometimes to monuments of grandeur or of art which do not subserve any immediate purpose of utility. Again, new facilities are oftentimes provided for on a scale which private enterprise would not attempt. Public activities are often undertaken for conserving health or maintaining more perfect order, and have in view considerations of general welfare most commendable in their nature, but such as would not be initiated in expectation of immediate profit. The enormous burden of municipal expenditures in the United States is more and more attracting attention, and there is a crying demand for relief.

The aggregate expenditure of the Federal Government for the year 1890 was $297,736,487; in 1910 it was $659,705,391, an increase of approximately 122 per cent.

To all these must be added—and special attention is called to this—the oppressive burden of military and naval armaments, now involving a cost to the civilized nations of $2,000,000,000 a year, an economic waste which imposes an almost unendurable burden upon the world's resources. The expense of the Naval Establishment of the United States for the year 1890 was $22,006,206; in 1910 it was $123,173,717.

The increased burden of government is most strikingly revealed in the increasing per capita tax rate. The following table shows the increases of both State and Federal taxes in the State of New York since 1860:

Per capita tax rate in New York.

[Derived from report of the comptroller of New York.]

Date.	State ad valorem.	State indirect.	Federal taxes.	Total.
1860.....	$3.96	.....	$1.78	$5.74
1870.....	8.86	.....	10.26	19.12
1880.....	11.09	.....	6.65	17.74
1890.....	12.53	$0.53	6.43	19.49
1900.....	16.69	1.83	7.43	25.95
1910.....	21.82	4.07	7.48	33.37

Increase from 1890 to 1910, 71 per cent; increase from 1900 to 1910, 28 per cent.

It would be incorrect to assert that many of these larger expenditures are not attended by the most beneficial results to the citizens of the municipality and Nation, but they create a more munificent scale of expenditure and one which from an economic standpoint seriously interferes with the relation between production and consumption, and thereby inevitably tends to increase prices and the resultant cost of living.

(2) Unequal progress: The second general cause which should be considered is the notably unequal progress in the different branches of endeavor which satisfy human wants. This is true alike in the production of commodities and in the utilization of personal service.

The index numbers displayed in the following tables indicate clearly how unequal the rise has been in different commodities. They give relative wholesale prices and are compiled from Bulletin No. 99 of the Bureau of Labor, published March, 1912. References are made to pages of that publication.

[3] The basis of value in silk has been changed. The ad valorem duties levied under the act of 1897 have been very generally discontinued, and a specific duty is now levied instead, which makes comparison difficult.

A study of the tables above shows conclusively that the rise in prices has been very uneven in different classes of commodities. The summary given in Table X reveals the fact that the most conspicuous rise has been in the price of farm products, which is very closely related to the increase in population, per capita consumption, and the movement of population to cities, together with the operation of the law of diminishing returns in agriculture.

The next most conspicuous increase has been in the price of lumber and building material, in which lumber is by far the most important item. This increase is readily traced to the diminishing supply of a natural resource.

The next most conspicuous increase is in the cost of foods, of which the farm products mentioned are the principal constituent. Perhaps, however, the most surprising feature is that the price of food has not risen in the same proportion as the cost of farm products. This can be explained by the fact that certain classes of foods, notably tropical fruits, have decreased in price; and also to the fact that the margin of profit between the farm product and the food product may have been considerably decreased.

It will be noted that on the whole there has been comparatively slight advance in the last 15 years in fuel and lighting, metals and implements, drugs and chemicals, or house furnishings. In fact, in the case of house furnishings, excluding manufactures of wood, there is probably no increase, and possibly a decrease. The general conclusion to be drawn from this state of facts is that we must look carefully to particular causes for the advance in the cost of living, and not indiscriminately assert that there has been an increase in prices, nor carelessly attribute the phenomena to causes that have no possible relation to the fact.

In examining these tables in detail, it will be noticed from Table I that flour has not increased in the same ratio as wheat, and that soda crackers and bread have shown almost no increase.

From Table II it will be noticed that there has been a very considerable increase in both steers and hogs, and that the increase in all classes of fresh meat has been in almost perfect rhythm with the price variations of the live animals, which may be taken to indicate a close relation of market conditions between the two.

Table III indicates that the price of granulated sugar has held comparatively steady for a long period of years. That potatoes fluctuate violently is undoubtedly due to crop conditions. The same thing is generally true of onions. A striking example of the effect of crop conditions will be derived from the price of prunes in 1910 and 1911, as shown by the relative price. The recent increase in the price of coffee is also to be noted.

In Table IV it will be noticed that while the price of cotton has advanced very materially, the price of men's hose, women's hose, and Lonsdale shirting, which are typical cotton goods, have shown comparatively small increase or even a decrease. From the same table it will be noticed that woolen goods have a tendency to follow the price of wool, but the prices do not show as marked a downward tendency as those of cotton.

Table V will show a comparison of the price of green hides with leather and leather goods, indicating that there has been a much less increase in both leather and leather manufactures than green hides, although hides were put on the free list.

Table VI shows that there has been comparatively little advance in house furnishings, except in the manufactures of wood, such as bedroom sets, which, of course, is due to the conspicuous rise in the cost of lumber.

From Table VII a comparison can be made between the relative price of iron in its cruder forms and in finished products. The steady price of steel rails is to be noted, undoubtedly indicating a very strong price control. Another striking feature of this table is the exceptional increase of builders' hardware, apparently out of all proportion to its primary materials.

By Table VIII it can be seen that there has been an exceptional increase in certain classes of building material, notably lumber. In this connection it is interesting to note how science and inventive genius tend to supply new materials when the old materials have become excessively high. The increasing use of cement and brick, which show little increase in cost, is perhaps one of the most conspicuous features of modern construction.

Table IX is a tabulation of very striking relative prices of certain commodities not otherwise classified. The spectacular rise of crude rubber is particularly to be noted, which is undoubtedly in response to the enormously increased demand for its use in automobile tires and kindred uses. It will be noted that its last period of rise began in 1902, and with a notable recession in 1908 has kept pace with the development of the automobile industry. It will also be noted that print paper has, generally speaking, shown a steady decline in prices, while petroleum has remained comparatively uniform, but, on the whole, with a decline in price during the past 10 years.

Table X gives a summary of relative prices by classes of commodities. It will be observed that in the year 1911 there was a noticeable recession in prices of all classes except food, and drugs and chemicals, which show a slight increase over any previous year.

In considering the disproportionate rise revealed by these tables special attention may be called to the inequality in the means of producing different categories of products. While new methods in industry and commerce are working a revolution, their effect is far more helpful in some cases than in others.

It is evident that science working through invention and improved methods has not accomplished the same result in agriculture as in manufactures. The revolution accomplished in industrial methods and in the utilization of capital in large-scale operations has not been accompanied by equal progress on the farm. Although very considerable advance has been made in the transportation of agricultural products to the market and in preserving them for use, these pertain to transportation and to the middleman rather than to the original producer. Improvements in agricultural implements have been very considerable, but have wrought no revolution such as has been manifest in many processes of manufacture.

In addition to the less degree of assistance from invention further reasons may be found for the increased prices of agricultural products in the growing scarcity of new lands suitable for profitable cultivation, and in our own country the early cultivation of fertile areas was conducted with too much regard for immediate returns, and consequently little attention was paid to permanent productive quality.

No description of the diminished relative production of agricultural products is complete without taking into account tendencies which are social as well as economic. The following tables show the growing density of population and the disparity of increase between city and country:

Rural population	40,227,491	45,197,390	49,348,883	22.6

From the above figures it may also be readily calculated that in 1890 the rural population was 63.9 per cent of the total, in 1900 it had fallen to 59.5 per cent, and in 1910 to 53.7 per cent of the whole.

The above tables are exceedingly significant. Since 1850 the density of population has increased from 7.9 to 30.9 per square mile. Although a density of practically 31 to the square mile is not great as compared with many foreign countries, yet it indicates that the time is near in America when the pressure upon the means of subsistence is becoming a factor to be reckoned with.

As a matter of immediate concern, however, the conspicuous movement of population from the country to the city is more important. This movement is powerfully reenforced in our own country by the distribution of immigrants, who desire to live with those of their own language and to belong to churches or associations of their own people. Beyond this, it is not merely the brilliant glare of the electric light or the alluring attraction of the moving-picture show that directs population to the city. The possibilities for success are regarded as infinitely greater, and although a comparatively few may attain to the highest prizes of fortune, nevertheless the average wage obtained is greater. As a result of these factors the farmer is constantly hampered because of the scarcity of help or by his inability to obtain laborers qualified for work on the farm.

The increase in the price of farm products in the Temperate Zones is well illustrated in the case of the raw material used in the manufacture of clothing. Until very recently the price of cotton showed a marked increase. The price of middling cotton per pound in the year 1895 was 7.11 cents on the New York market; in 1903, 11.18 cents; in 1910, 15.11 cents, or twice as much as 15 years before.

The price of fine wool in the eastern markets in the month of January, 1895, at which time there was no duty, was 17½ cents; in 1903, 30 cents; and in 1910, 36 cents. Attention has already been called to the disproportionate consumption of wool as compared with 20 years ago. A much larger quantity must be imported, and foreign sources of supply are not as abundant as formerly. Wide ranges occupied by sheep are now cut up into farms, utilized for the growing of grain. The great areas of public land in the West, where sheep herdsmen were allowed to pasture their flocks at will, are now under strict Government jurisdiction and a charge is made for their occupation. The increase in the supply of cotton has been materially greater than that of wool, though here the increase of consumption in comparison with production is no less apparent.

In a very valuable report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, in the Department of Agriculture, for the year 1910, a comparison is made between the increase in the price of the articles purchased by farmers during the 10 years from 1899 to 1909 and the increase in value per acre of that which the farmer sells. For the articles purchased by the farmer the average increase was 12.1 per cent, while the average rate of increase in value per acre of that which he sells was 72.7 per cent, or six times as much. The comparison is made even more emphatic when it is noted that among the articles purchased by the farmer flour and lard show a maximum, or nearly maximum, increase in prices paid by him, and these increases are in response to higher prices obtained for his wheat and hogs.

To the rise in the price of articles of food there is one general exception, namely, the price of tropical and semitropical products, most of which show a decrease, for a variety of reasons which do not exist in the case of products of the Temperate Zone.

To briefly summarize the reasons, it may be said that communication with the Tropics by steamship has greatly increased. Large boats provided with refrigerating equipment carry large quantities of bananas and other articles of the Tropical Zones to the ports and centers of population in Europe and in the United States. Agencies for the collection and purchase of fruit have been established in these tropical countries. Plantations have been developed there by foreigners. Salutary progress has been made in sanitation. The yield is very large and crops require only slight attention. There is a practically unlimited quantity of land available for cultivation. In addition to the increased communication between the Tropical and Temperate Zones and the development by outside effort, there must be recognized a certain degree of increased energy and development among the people of tropical regions. In view of all these facts, there has been no commensurate rise in prices, but rather a decrease.

In order to understand the effect of the unequal development which has to do with the present condition of prices, it is unnecessary for us to go outside of a very obvious illustration based upon a comparison of the growth of agriculture and of manufactures in the United States since the close of the Civil War. For a period of approximately a quarter of a century after 1865 the most marked development was in agriculture, though manufactures showed a healthy increase and were rapidly expanding. In contrast from about 1890 to the present date the feature has been the development of manufactures and lines of activity other than agricultural.

This great general fact furnishes the principal cause of the present era of high prices of farm products in the United States. Generally speaking, the same disparity has existed all over the world, though the contrast has been more manifest here. There is nothing mysterious or difficult in the explanation of this unequal development in the two periods. In 1865 there was a great area of fertile land in the United States not yet inclosed or prepared for cultivation. A great army of men had returned from service in the Union Army, many of whom had come back with a spirit of self-reliance peculiarly qualifying them for settlement in new localities. So far as the personal element is concerned, the same conditions existed in the South, though its growth was deferred because of the dislocation caused by a transition from slave to free labor and a greater exhaustion of resources. Awaiting these returning soldiers were great quantities of land at cheap prices, or available for homesteads without cost, or upon bounty warrants for military service. Many millions of acres granted to railroads were offered to settlers at reasonable prices, and in addition year by year State lands were placed upon the market at cheap prices on the theory that the best interests of Commonwealths were promoted by obtaining settlers rather than by retaining lands for higher prices. Indian reservations were acquired for settlement. A great domain was opened in Oklahoma in 1889, and the development of that State is one of the most marvelous illustrations of growth which can be found either in the history of farm or of industrial development. The occupation of new lands was stimulated by the high prices existing in the decade following the Civil War. Wheat sold at $1.08 gold prices in 1866 and at 92.6 cents in 1876. These high prices continued until 1886. A still further fact promoted agricultural development. Contrary to the normal rule for the construction of railroads and the growth of systems of transportation, great lines of railways, aided by land grants, preceded settlement and population, instead of as in the eastern country, where railroads followed settlement and development which already existed.

In this agricultural development may be found a most striking illustration of that which happens in any era of progress, namely, a great increase in the preparation or equipment for increased production. In the periods and cycles which mark material development a growth of this kind continues until other lines of activity become more profitable or attractive. Indeed, in the tendency to follow the same course of development it usually continues until prices have been reduced to a level below that which is profitable. By the year 1894 farm products temporarily reached a low level, the result of this settlement of millions of acres of new land in the West and the Southwest and of the business depression of that time.

Nothing could more emphatically show the disproportionate increase in agriculture after 1890 than statistics in regard to cattle. The total number of cattle in the United States, as reported by the Census Bureau, was:

In 1870	23,820,608
In 1880	39,675,533
In 1890	57,648,793
In 1900	52,403,828
In 1910	53,997,327

Thus it is to be noted that from 1870 to 1880 there was an increase in number of 15,854,925, or 66.5 per cent; from 1880 to 1890 there was an increase in number of 17,973,260, or 45.2 per cent; while between 1890 and 1900 there was an actual decrease of 5,244,965, and between 1900 and 1910 an increase of only 1,593,499, or barely 3 per cent.

In seeking to find the cause for the increased prices of beef it is altogether unnecessary to go beyond these figures. They show that in the face of an increase in population of 29,024,552 from 1890 to 1910, not taking into account the conceded increase in consumption per individual, there was a notable decrease in the number of cattle of 3,651,466, or 6.3 per cent. The wholesale price of dressed beef in the New York market in 1890 was $6.96 per hundred; in 1900, $9.73; and in 1910, $14.61.

In tracing the exceptional rise of divers commodities special attention should be called to the growing scarcity or diminished availability of supplies of raw material.

The lumber supply of the United States, which at one time seemed abundant and even inexhaustible, has, in view of the great demand for buildings, furniture, and so forth, been diminished to such an extent as to almost threaten an early exhaustion. The diminishing supply of timber in the face of unusual demand has caused a rapid and continuous increase in the price of products of the forest.

In the comparison of different groups of manufactures the advance from 1900 to 1910 has been greatest in this class. In the 10 years named the wholesale prices of woodenware and furniture, as compiled by the Department of Commerce and Labor, show an increase of about 20 per cent. The increase in the cost of lumber was considerably greater than that of manufactures of wood. But the prices of window glass and certain grades of earthenware, according to the figures of the same department, have decreased nearly as much. For this divergence there is an evident explanation, namely, that the supply of timber is becoming more limited, while that of sand and clay and other materials for glass and earthenware is practically inexhaustible and readily available.

In analyzing the situation as regards prices, it is essential to keep in mind the difference between a rise in the price of certain classes of products and a general rise in the price level. It is confidently asserted that both of these phenomena are in evidence and that an increase is manifest in almost every commodity and in the cost of service as well, so that we may accurately refer to a general rise in prices. On a more careful examination it will appear that this is not altogether true. The increased cost of living is rather due to an exceptional rise in the cost of certain necessaries of life and in the requirement for additional personal service. That which is most noticeable is the marked increase in certain essential commodities or facilities, such as food and shelter. Throughout all periods, notwithstanding changes in fashion and taste, there has existed a demand, amounting to a necessity, for food. Clothing and shelter are in the same class, though somewhat less urgent.

The rising cost of the primary food products can not, perhaps, be better demonstrated than by the comparative cost of food for one soldier of the United States Army at different periods. A table prepared under the direction of Henry G. Sharpe, Commissary General, United States Army, which I shall append, shows that with identically the same ration the annual cost in 1908 was $68.62, and in 1912, $86.32. Assuming that an Army ration represents the actual cost of food necessary for a comfortable subsistence, and that the consumption of an average family of five is equal to that of four able-bodied soldiers, which conforms to the usual estimate, it will appear that food for the average family costing $274.48 in 1908, for the present year will cost $345.28.

It should be carefully borne in mind that a vital distinction between high prices and the high cost of living is apparent. The increased cost of many essential commodities furnishes the reason for but a part of the increased cost of living. The far greater consumption of the average citizen, his demand for luxuries, and for leisure and the wider range of his activities and amusements must also be taken into account.

3. Extravagance and waste: The inevitable tendency in every progressive era is toward extravagance and waste in expenditure, accompanied by the diminished productive energy of a large share of the population.

This tendency has its roots in universal characteristics of human nature. Whenever a new process is invented for satisfying a human want, or a new market is discovered, the inviting prospect of gain will cause investment and effort in that new direction. This oftentimes results in a loss of capital and an oversupply of certain commodities, which leads to waste.

Increased wealth and the accompanying demand for commodities lead to increase of prices, and have incidental results, which frequently assume greater importance than the principal fact. Increasing demands and rising prices are the parents of speculation. The anticipation of profit from such increased demand leads to purchases for the purpose of withholding from the market, and oftentimes the artificial stimulus thus given to prices of land or commodities causes a rise far beyond the normal and legitimate increase in value. Speculation is often accompanied by fraudulent enterprises. The recent report of the Post Office Department estimates that $120,000,000 were lost during 1911 by gullible investors who responded to alluring advertisements promising large profits. Such fraudulent schemes could only be promoted in a time of progress and of successful enterprises. It is during such times that people become careless of the security of their investments and most readily yield to the enticing representations of irresponsible promoters and swindlers.

INCREASED PRODUCTION OF GOLD.

No subject has been more discussed in the consideration of this problem than the effect of the great gold production beginning in the year 1891. The preponderant opinion of commercial and financial writers has been that this increase has been the leading influence in the high cost of living and the present situation as regards prices. It will, of course, be conceded that if the price level of all commodities had been equally affected, and if labor and rent had shown no greater change than commodities, the effect of the greater supplies of gold would be more readily accepted as an adequate explanation, but the variations in the price level are almost as striking as the increases, and thus the question of price changes seems to require a more minute analysis.

Increased production of gold has a substantial effect on prices, which may be described under three distinct phases:

First, a considerable number of persons are attracted to gold mining from other employments. This diminishes the number engaged in the ordinary branches of productive activity, agriculture, manufacturing, as the case may be, thus diminishing production in those lines, while the larger number of those engaged in gold mining increases the demand for essential supplies. In a twofold manner prices are increased. The effect of this diversion from other employments to mining has no doubt been considerably exaggerated by some writers of eminence. It, nevertheless, has a substantial influence.

Second, gold is a measure of value; all the different species of property are measured by it. If an increase in the supply of gold occurs which is out of proportion to that of other objects of utility, the price of objects other than gold must increase. Time, however, is required to bring about this result. The accumulated quantity of the precious metals is so considerable that the accretions of a single year have only a very slight effect on the relation between them and other commodities.

The third effect is more immediate and altogether more potent in its effect upon prices than either of the other two, namely, the increased supply of money which is made available especially in the form of bank reserves upon which an extension of credit may be based. In any progressive society there are always numerous enterprises which await development. Whenever the promoter desires to build a railroad or provide for any great enterprise he must ascertain whether he can obtain the necessary money or what amounts to the same thing—credit.

In determining the commercial or industrial activity of every period it is necessary for us to take into account two clearly distinguishable lines of activity: (1) Provision for near-by consumption, such as food and clothing for the people, and that, too, on the present scale of living; (2) equipment for future production to provide for additional wants. The prominence of the second phase of activity determines the difference between a period of dullness or depression and one of apparently great prosperity. The periodic seasons of business depression which exist are determined very largely by the extent to which provision is being made for the enlargement of existing facilities. The usual history of every business cycle includes a time of increasing activity in making large provision for the future, as in the railway building prior to the crisis of 1873, the great development in Argentina prior to the Baring failure, the building of some work of great magnitude, such as the Hoosac Tunnel or the Panama Canal, or a time of general enlargement of facilities.

In such a time great numbers are always withdrawn from production for near-by consumption, the satisfying of ordinary wants, into enterprises which are not immediately remunerative. When this activity in making provision for the future reaches a certain point, it is found that there are numerous investments of capital, the returns from which will be postponed for a considerable time, and frequently the result is a crisis; that is, the activity which has been maintained, and the prices which have been reached, can not be maintained, and a collapse follows the boom condition which has existed.

Now, in any time of increased gold production, this greater activity, due to the larger amount of money in existence and the greater extension of credit, made possible by additional gold supplies, continues for a long period. It is not restricted to the usual cycle of 10 years, in which we see alternately dullness, greater activity, rising prices, a boom, and then a collapse. There is a general condition of larger activity, and expansion incident to progress, which lasts, with interruption, for a longer time than 10 years. Prices rise partly because of the number engaged in gold mining, as mentioned, partly because of the different relation between commodities and the supply of gold, and partly because of the increased activity which is stimulated by larger quantities of money furnishing a basis for credit.

In time, however, prices adjust themselves to the new supply of gold, and the rise ceases. The increased quantity of gold tends to diffuse itself as water seeks its level. This diffusion is in part accomplished by the greater demand of individuals in the way of per capita circulation in a time of increasing wealth; also by the higher prices, which require a larger amount of money, and by the greater degree of commercial and industrial activity; also in large measure by the shipment of gold to countries which theretofore have had a deficient supply, or in providing for the substitution of gold for silver as the standard coinage. As an illustration of the general increase in industrial and commercial activity it may be said that while the production of gold has been very rapidly increasing since 1890, other commodities have increased in equal, and sometimes greater, measure, and the question arises whether invention and the development of new fields has caused an equal increment in other lines of industry. Have cheapening influences been effective in other branches of production? While the world's annual output of gold was nearly four times as great in 1911 as that in 1890, there was almost as great an increase in the production of coal in the United States, the mining of which has increased from 140,000,000 tons in 1890 to 447,000,000 tons in 1910. Copper showed a greater growth than either, or from 115,966 tons in 1890 to 482,214 tons in 1910. In remote times the movement of surplus gold was from the Orient to the Occident; in more recent times the movement has been from the Occident to the Orient. In this connection Prof. Jevons refers to Asia as the sink for gold.

There is another very potent influence which begins to show its effect under the continued increase, namely, gold mining will prove less profitable. If, in an era of low prices, gold mining is commenced, the greater quantity of commodities which can be obtained with a certain amount of gold is very large; but after this gold supply has gained greater magnitude, as after a period of 20 years of increased production, prices will so rise that the production of gold becomes less profitable and tends to slacken. There is a probability also that the richest fields will be exhausted, and the rise in prices may be checked by that condition.

There is a very substantial difference in the history of gold mining succeeding discoveries in California and Australia about 1850 and at the time of the great increase which commenced in South Africa a little more than 40 years later. The supplies in the first instance were derived largely from placer mining, while in the latter period they were obtained from the reduction of ores. In the first period and in all mining prior thereto there was a much larger element of chance, the amount of production being dependent on the more or less accidental discoveries of pure gold. In the second period vast bodies of varying grades of ore were located. By virtue of the development of mining engineering and the perfection of chemical processes almost exact computation could be made as to whether such ores could be profitably reduced. The invention of the gold dredge and the utilization of the cyanide process about the year 1890 have explained the great increase in gold production in the last 20 years. Formerly mining was largely the result of what is called "a find." It is related that the great silver mine in Peru was discovered by the uprooting of a bush or small tree, which, when pulled out by a pedestrian, disclosed the silver beneath. Gold mining has become a thoroughly established and calculable industry, subject to the effective operations of the economic law of diminishing returns.

Historically it must be admitted that the argument for this opinion that the increase of precious metals has increased prices has very much support. Throughout long eras they have kept pace with prices. This was most noticeably the case in those periods in which gold and silver passed from hand to hand in payment of commodities or articles sold in the various processes of exchange. This is now, with more rapid communication and with modern facilities for settlement of balances and the divers substitutes for currency, much less apparent.

From the discovery of the silver mines of Potosi in 1546 to the discovery of gold in California in 1848, the annual value of silver mined was very considerably greater than that of gold. From that time until 1882, after the development of the mines not only in California but in Australia, the annual coinage value of gold was greater. Then for 15 years to 1897 the coinage value of silver mined in every year was in excess of that of gold.

Beginning with the last-named year, not only the coinage value but the commercial value of gold has in each year surpassed that of silver. From 1851 to 1870 the world's annual production of gold was strikingly uniform, varying from $123,000,000 in the years 1864–65 to about $134,000,000 annually from 1856 to 1860. The annual average was $127,467,583 for the 20 years named. From 1871 to 1890, inclusive, the annual output declined, averaging $107,030,400 for these 20 years. Beginning in 1891 with an output valued at $130,650,000, there has been a practically uninterrupted average annual increase of $21,600,000, save in the three years, 1900 to 1902, inclusive, when there was a diminished production because of the Boer War. In 1911 the production attained the maximum figure of $462,704,000.

The following is the average production for the years named:

1871 to 1890, inclusive	107,080,400
1891 to 1895, inclusive	162,947,000
1896 to 1900, inclusive	257,301,000
1901 to 1905, inclusive	322,619,600
1906 to 1910, inclusive	433,359,200

It is maintained that during the greater share of this time the prices of commodities showed a close correspondence with gold supply. From 1849 when the index figure representing the prices of all commodities was only 64 there was an increase by 1873 to 86. Also, from the latter part of the last decade of the last century to the present time, barring such decreases as are due to exceptional production and commercial or industrial depression, there has been a steady increase.

In studying prices throughout the whole period of 60 years, there has, however, been an important exception. Generally speaking, there was a marked decline in prices from 1873 to 1896–97. This can hardly be ascribed to the slightly diminished gold production for the 20 years after 1870.

There are three substantial reasons for diminished prices in this period:

(1) The annual production of gold, which had slightly declined, bore a much smaller proportion to the existing stock, and commercial and industrial operations were on so much vaster a scale as to readily absorb the annual increment.

(2) The demonetization of silver by the most advanced nations. It is shown by figures that India and Japan, in which silver remained the standard, showed no decrease in prices between the years 1873 and 1896, this contemporaneously with a fall in gold-using countries of more than 20 per cent. The index numbers for those countries are less reliable than for others, but the computed increase in India was from 107, in 1873, to 140, in 1896, and in Japan from 104 to 133 for the same years.

It must be remarked in this connection that too much reliance must not be placed upon these figures as showing the controlling effect of using silver as a standard in India and Japan. Both were showing progressive tendencies and Japan especially was not only coming more largely in contact with the civilized nations of the earth, but was manifesting an almost unparalleled growth among her own people.

(3) The third reason for the cheapening of commodities in agriculture was the development of great areas of farm land and better communication with those areas, and, in manufacture, by inventive processes and more economical production under the improved methods of that time.

(4) Two severe seasons of industrial and commercial depression, beginning, respectively, in 1873 and 1893.

The inference that the supply of precious metals has a governing effect upon prices is supported by an analysis of the figures over longer periods. During the years from 1789 to 1809 there was a rise in prices from an index figure of 85 to one of 157, or more than 80 per cent. During these years the average production of gold in the whole world was a little less than $12,000,000 a year and that of silver approximately $37,000,000, or $49,000,000 in all.

There were many contributing causes of high prices, such as the prevalence of war and the interference with international trade caused by the French Revolution and the Napoleonic wars. Mr. Tooke, the author of the History of Prices, lays stress upon the poor harvests of that period, but Prof. Jevons ascribes the increase to the larger production of gold and silver, and points out that metals and oils were more affected than grain.

Beginning in 1809, for a period of 40 years prices fell from an index number of 157 to 64, or nearly 60 per cent. This decrease has been very generally ascribed to the falling off in the precious metals, which did not revive until the gold discoveries in California and Australia. The influence of the precious metals, it must be conceded, is strongly sustained by the great falling off in mining during this period.

Beginning in the year 1811, the annual average for the next 10 years was $7,606,000 of gold, or a decrease from the preceding decade of more than 33 per cent, and $22,000,000 of silver, or a decrease from the preceding decade of about 40 per cent. In the following decade, from 1821 to 1830, there was an increase in the mining of gold and a decrease in that of silver, but the total annual average was slightly less than that from 1811 to 1820. From 1831 to 1840 there was a substantial increase in both metals, amounting to about 33 per cent. The annual average production of gold during the period 1841 to 1850 was $36,000,000, being an increase of about $23,000,000 over the average of the preceding decade. However, in the 40 years from 1811 to 1850, inclusive, an era of low prices, the average annual production of gold was barely $17,000,000 per year, while with the opening of mines in California and Australia the annual average for the decade following 1850 rose from $17,000,000 to over $130,000,000.

The insignificance of this production prior to 1850 may be determined when it is considered that the average annual output of gold for these 40 years from 1811 to 1850 was only equal to that of less than a fortnight in 1911. The production for the single year 1911 was nearly nine-tenths as much as for the whole 40 years.

It should be carefully borne in mind that the period from 1849 was a time of great industrial advancement, in which many inventions and improvements were utilized. In the period from 1849 to 1873 prices rose from 64 to 86, or about 33 per cent. In the period from 1873 to 1896, as already stated, there was a decline in the countries in which gold is the standard. Manifestly there were other causes for the decrease in prices at this time. The great increase in facilities for transportation culminating after the opening of the Suez Canal in 1869 brought different portions of the earth nearer to each other and made it possible to utilize the abundance afforded by outlying countries for the benefit of the more settled areas, where food products were in great demand. Again, there were most notable advancements in the mechanical arts. So considerable was the falling off in prices that several writers, of whom, perhaps, Mr. David A. Wells and M. Émile de Laveleye are the best examples, came to the conclusion that the period of the most buoyant activity in commerce and industry had come to an end, and thereafter the people would occupy themselves with repairs and replacement or in utilizing discoveries already made. In other words, the period of the most profitable production had reached a limit.

In all calculations relating to the mining of precious metals attention must be given to the relation of the annual increment to the accumulated supply. In the year 1851 the annual increment is estimated to have been as much as 3.1 per cent; in 1871 there was an increase of only 1.6 per cent; in 1891 the increase was 1.5 per cent, and since the beginning of the very large production several years later the annual output is equal to about 3 per cent of the total existing money supply. Of the $454,000,000 mined in 1909, it has been estimated that $145,000,000 was utilized in the arts. This may be a large estimate, but in any event the primary money of the gold-standard countries was increased by three hundred millions in the year 1909. The very carefully prepared estimate of Dr. Roberts, Director of the Mint, gives the amount of coinage for that year at $313,000,000.

It is said that the connection between the increased supply of the precious metals and the general level of prices has been so marked and has appeared in so great variety of countries and of periods as to preclude the possibility of mere coincidence.

It must be recognized that certain modifying factors should be taken into account. The rise in prices after the beginning of the increase in the supply of gold and silver does not become manifest until some time has elapsed. This can be readily explained because a substantial increase is necessary to modify the relation between the existing stock of the precious metals and the accretions. Again, after a very largely increased supply has continued for a number of years, the effect seems to be neutralized. As heretofore explained, this is due to a multitude of factors, such as higher prices, more general diffusion of money, the absorption for bank reserves, the greatly augmented transactions of commerce, and, of course, the further fact that the annual production is a smaller percentage of the existing stock than before.

While not intending to belittle the important influence upon prices exerted by increased supplies of gold, it is submitted that the controlling effect of gold production has been materially exaggerated. Along with the increased supply of precious metals, there has almost always existed a concurrence of the great tendencies which make for increased activity and rising standards of living. The development of gold mining on a large scale has followed closely after discoveries and inventions. After the great awakening which marked the end of the fifteenth century and the discovery of America there was a great increase in the supply of gold and silver. On the other hand, with the decadence of the Roman Empire until its fall in 476, gold mining almost entirely disappeared.

TARIFF.

In making these remarks I have sought to avoid as far as possible any subject of political controversy. The facts developed by investigation, however, so conclusively disprove a prevalent misapprehension that the tariff of 1909 is a very prominent factor in the present high cost of living that I can not omit a somewhat extended treatment of that question. Nothing could be more fallacious. It may be conceded that the effect of any tariff policy is to increase prices, certainly in the earlier years of its operation, and on some products to cause a permanent increase. This is clearly true of a revenue tariff upon articles not the product of the country in question. It is also true, to an extent, of competitive articles. The diversity of employment, fostered by protective duties, raises wages and thus has a tendency to increase prices. The extent to which domestic competition is maintained in the manufacture of a protected article has an important bearing upon the price. The increase is materially influenced by the proportion between foreign importations and domestic production. If much the larger share of domestic consumption is supplied by home production, the increase upon prices is slight. Indeed, the possible increase in the cost is measured with a considerable degree of definiteness by the proportion which the domestic supply bears to the total consumption. As the domestic production is smaller, the increase in price is proportionately larger. A most important influence is exerted by the creation of competing sources of supply by fostering tariffs under which an industry is developed so that two countries compete for the same market and there is an inevitable tendency toward a lower price. In the tariff act of 1890 additional duties were imposed upon prunes, raisins, and figs. The result was the development of a competing supply on the Pacific coast and a very great decrease in the price of these articles in the succeeding years. This has been well illustrated in the case of iron and steel products.

While the processes of invention have had a great deal to do with diminished cost, steel rails which cost $160 per ton in 1869, after the lapse of more than 40 years, now sell for $28. It is, nevertheless, incredible that so great a decrease could have occurred without the stimulating effect of a protective tariff, which gives the industry a foothold here and creates a competing source of supply in our own country.

The name of Mr. McKinley was intimately associated with the manufacture of tin plate. Unfavorable opinions were expressed as to our success in the manufacture of this article. But as the result of the tariff in 1890, substantially restored in 1897 after an interval in which lower duties prevailed in the three years after 1894, quotations upon tin plate have been considerably diminished. The same is true of wire nails and of a great number of articles which might be enumerated.

But the fact that the tariff act of 1909 is not the cause of high prices is conclusively proven by several facts:

(1) As already stated, the increase in prices is world-wide and in evidence in other countries of advanced civilization and progressive tendency as well as in our own.

(2) The most notable increases have been in commodities of which we have a considerable surplus for export, and no tariff can have any material effect upon the price of such articles.

(3) In our own country these increases have been manifested indiscriminately, without regard to higher or lower rates in the tariff act of 1909, and, in fact, have been most considerable in the case of articles on which there are no duties at all.

There has been an increase in the cost of shoes since 1908, especially in the retail price, yet the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill diminished these duties 10 per cent on one grade and 15 per cent on another. Leather is also higher than in 1908, although this duty is from 5 to 15 per cent less than under the Dingley Act. Hides, upon which the duty of 15 per cent was absolutely removed, so that they were placed upon the free list, have shown some decline, especially during the last year, in common with the general price movement toward lower levels. However, they are still quoted higher than in 1908.

In the face of a decrease in the duty on lumber ranging from 75 cents to $1.25 per thousand, the prices have shown an increase since 1909. Turpentine, which during all the time has been on the free list, has risen from an index number of 146 in 1909 to one of 203 in 1911.

Castile soap, upon which there was no change in duty, has fallen from an index number of 183.1 in 1890 to 148.7. The duty on this article is 1¼ cents per pound. Rubber, which for many years has been on the free list, rose from an index number of 185 in 1909 to 238.2 in 1910. Of late, notwithstanding the greatly increased demand for this article, there has been a slump in prices, due to the development of additional sources of supply. Builders' hardware, upon which there was a slight decrease on the different articles included in this classification, increased from an index number of 191.6 in 1909 to 216.1 in 1910. Tin pig, upon which there was only a conditional duty, not effective, rose from an index number of 151.1 in 1909 to 232.8 in 1911.

Indeed, the variations in prices have been so very considerable, both in the way of increase and decrease, as absolutely to disprove any inference that the change in prices have been due to the tariff act of 1909; or, indeed, traceable to any other tariff act. As a result of scientific progress, certain commodities have shown the effect of invention, improved methods in transportation and distribution, and have consequently shown very notable decreases in prices. Others have shown an increased demand, which has not been counteracted by improved processes or by the continuance of equally available supplies of raw material.

Further arguments in regard to the effect of the tariff on prices must be noted. The argument for lower duties, most strenuously asserted by those who have given the greatest thought to the subject, is that undue attention has been given in our own country to the development of manufactures. Should, however, the duty be so reduced on these articles as to drive out of existence plants which are now in use, the diminished supply in our own country would have to be satisfied from abroad, and the diminished market for agricultural products at home must be augmented by uncertain demands from other countries. The inevitable result would be an increased demand upon foreign countries for the articles subject to tariffs, which would be followed by a commensurate increase in their prices both at home and here.

The devices now resorted to in the way of preferential railway rates for exports to the United States and preferences in rates granted by trans-Atlantic ships would disappear, and we should be subjected to the full effect not only of an increased cost of production abroad by reason of the increased demand, but the increased costs of transportation. The prices of products of other countries, which are reduced below the price level of the country of origin in order to obtain access to our markets, would be immediately restored.

It must be recognized in this connection that our own country is for many commodities much the largest market in the world, and for some articles affords a greater demand than all the rest of the world combined. It would be impossible to diminish the local sources of supply without a notable increase in prices of foreign articles which would take their place.

There is a prevalent impression that great quantities of goods are stored in warehouses and factories, to be sold at cheap prices, awaiting shipment to the United States, and only kept out by reason of the tariff. Should the tariff wall be entirely removed, it is probable that the decrease in prices of the majority of commodities in our own country would be only very slight. One illustration of this delusion—for it is nothing else—is derived from a comparison between prices of agricultural products, such as eggs, in the United States and Canada. The groundless expectation that this commodity would be reduced in price by a removal of the duty overlooks the fact that our own exports of this article to Canada are greater than those from Canada to the United States.

But it is alleged that they sell for less at Windsor than at Detroit, and that the removal of the duty of 5 cents per dozen would lead to a decrease in the price by that amount. A very simple calculation will show the absolute futility of this idea. The total production of eggs in Canada is only a small per cent of that of the United States. The removal of tariff duties would be sure to lead to an increase in prices in Canada—if any difference exists—to our level, because the greater consumption here would practically determine the price. There may be some slight increase, especially in times of unusual scarcity in the United States, but the general rule is that the cost in countries of predominant consumption and production would be sure to prevail. This is readily shown by a very simple illustration. Suppose men in a certain trade, 50 in number, received a wage of $2.75 per day, and one person should endeavor to obtain employment along with them who had worked for $2.50 a day; the result would be not a decrease in wages from $2.75 to $2.50, but an increase in wages of the one individual from $2.50 to $2.75.

TRUSTS.

A careful analysis of wholesale prices fails to support the opinion that the trusts and large combinations of capital have caused the present increase in prices. It is clear that complete monopoly or control of the market in the production or sale of any particular commodity affords a chance to increase its price. The same result is apparent when separate producers maintain an agreement or understanding as to prices. As a general proposition, on the other hand, the superior economy and efficiency of large-scale operations materially diminishes the cost of production, and even more, the cost of distribution, and should therefore tend to decrease prices. The formation of such industrial and commercial enterprises, therefore, seems to be a legitimate phase of business evolution. It must be said, however, with greater emphasis, that thus far the general public has not experienced the benefit of reduced prices to which it is entitled in view of the greater economy and efficiency naturally resulting from great combinations.

Overcapitalization, profits of promoters, fees of lawyers, all have tended to make the capitalization so large as to neutralize benefits derived from cheaper operation. There may be said to be two tendencies underlying the movement toward combination: One which is normal and responsive to those economic laws which make for cheapness or efficiency; another, which is not normal, in which cheapness and efficiency are entirely subordinate to private gain and efforts to secure monopoly. In proportion as the latter tendency or method is absent will the public be benefited by the formation and operation of large enterprises. The measure in which the public has enjoyed the benefit of these combinations is in too great degree dependent upon whether a spirit of liberality and fairness actuates the managers. In some instances they have given due regard to popular opinion and lowered prices and improved quality, when the hold upon the market which they possessed was so considerable that they were not compelled to do so.

If the people do not receive their proper share of the benefits of these aggregations, indeed in any event, strict control, beginning with greater publicity and reenforced by official regulation, is the inevitable outcome. So necessary is this governmental control that some have advocated public regulation of prices.

There are two great organizations which have gained a special hold upon the branches of production in which they are engaged—the Standard Oil Co. and the United States Steel Corporation. No doubt both of these corporations have engaged in practices which do not subserve the general weal, and the strong arm of the law has been invoked against them. But it would hardly be correct to say that the effect of the formation of these companies has been to raise prices. In the table prepared by the statistician of the Department of Agriculture, to which reference has been made, it appears that among over 80 enumerated articles purchased by the farmer there are only three the cost of which diminished between the years 1899 and 1909. Two of these are comparatively unimportant. The third is coal oil, which fell off from 15.1 cents per gallon in 1899 to 14.2 in 1909. There are also substantial reductions in prices of various forms of iron and steel in the same period—articles furnished by the Steel Corporation. The conclusion which may be reached is that, properly regulated, large-scale operations in manufacturing or in the business of the merchant—that is, in production or in distribution—should cheapen prices rather than increase them.

The difficulty is that the enormous power given to great combinations enables them to exert an influence amounting sometimes to absolute control over the prices of necessary commodities, which is subversive of the general interest. In some cases prices of one particular commodity are increased to an exorbitant figure, while other articles are disposed of by the same combination at figures such as to destroy competitors. It is evident that while the future will no doubt utilize the benefit of operations of colossal magnitude, the benefits must be secured by the most stringent requirements. Thus far some prices have increased by the combination movement, though not in sufficient degree to account for present conditions.

GENERAL INCREASE IN PRICES.

Has there been a general increase in prices? A careful analysis of the price movement goes far to disprove a prevalent impression that all prices have risen.

One source of this impression that all prices have risen is the custom of comparing present prices with the average for the decade extending from 1890 to 1899, inclusive. This period of 10 years includes five or six years, from 1893 to 1898, in which notably low prices prevailed.

The most complete comparisons available show that prices in 1890, and also in the decade from 1890 to 1899, inclusive, on which contemporaneous computations are based, were very materially lower than in preceding years.

Mr. Sauerbeck's tables give the 11 years from 1867 to 1877 as the standard represented by 100. The following table shows the relation between those years and certain later years:

Comparative prices of certain articles, 1878–1899.

Period.	Vegetable food.	Animal food.	Sugar, coffee, and tea.	Total food.	Minerals.	Textiles.	Sundry materials.	Total materials.	Grand total.	Silver.	Wheat harvested.
Average of prices, 11 years, 1867–1877	100	100	100	100	100	100	100	100	100	100	100
1878	95	101	90	96	74	78	88	81	87	86.4	108
1880	89	101	88	94	79	81	89	84	88	85.9	93
1885	68	88	63	74	66	65	76	70	72	79.9	108
1890	65	82	70	73	80	66	69	71	72	78.4	106
1878–1887	79	95	76	84	73	71	81	76	79	82.1	97
1890–1899	61	80	63	68	71	56	66	64	66	55.8	104

From this table it appears that vegetable food in the decade from 1890 to 1899 was worth in England only 61 per cent of the average value in the 11 years from 1867 to 1877; animal food, 80 per cent; sugar, coffee, and tea, 63 per cent; all articles of food, 68 per cent; minerals, 71 per cent; textiles, 56 per cent; sundry materials, 66 per cent; all materials, 64 per cent; and the grand total of all commodities, 66 per cent of the values in the 11 years from 1867 to 1877. These tables, of course, relate only to England, and contain also a valuation of silver, which in the decade from 1890 to 1899 was worth as a commodity only 55.8 per cent of its value in the earlier period mentioned.

This fall in silver contemporaneously with a decline in almost all commodities was much used in the latter part of the last century as an argument for its remonetization. However, the decline in prices was due to much more general causes which have already been mentioned.

While we have no tables for this period prepared with similar care in the United States, the same general price movement from 1867 to the last decade of the last century may be noted.

From this it appears that in basing our calculations upon the years from 1890 to 1899 we ignore an era of very much higher prices which, with a downward tendency, had prevailed for more than 30 years.

The statistics supplied by an official report in 1899 furnish the prices of a great variety of articles. From these tables it appears that the price of high-grade flour per barrel in New York in February, 1860, was $8.25; for the same month in 1870 and 1880 it was $9.25; in 1890, $5.65; in January, 1899, $4.30. In 1870 the price was probably somewhat affected by the premium on gold, which for that year was about 16 per cent.

There is little satisfaction in the study of prices in a period so remote as the years 1830 to 1840. Wide disparities appear in different localities. Different figures are dependent not so much upon the excellence of crops or the law of demand and supply as upon facilities for transportation, which in those years could not compare with the present. It does, however, appear that very many prices were higher. The price of calico in the Boston market until the beginning of the Civil War ranged around 10 cents a yard. In the last decade of the last century it averaged about half as much, and for the years from 1880 to 1890 was materially higher than in the succeeding 10 years. The price of carpets from 1850 to and through the Civil War and later was much higher than now. On the other hand, leather and many staple varieties of food were much lower The list showing higher prices in earlier years could be indefinitely extended, and in every case could be accounted for by economic tendencies or special conditions in which the tariff plays but a very subordinate part. In the case of some minor articles the prices of former years were phenomenally higher; for example, the price of quinine was in 1840, $3.25; in 1850 it was $4; in 1860, $1.40; in 1870, $2.20; in 1883, $3.25; while the price in 1899 was only 34 cents. It can not be claimed that the removal of the duty made this great revolution in price.

The following table, showing exports and imports of manufactures and the products of agriculture since 1820, and certain extracts derived from it, shows a revolution in production in our own country:

While formerly our exports were made up largely of food products, these have been relegated to a subordinate rank, and according to present tendencies before an interval of many years we will be importers rather than exporters. On the other hand, the export of articles of manufacture has very greatly increased. In the year 1898, as shown by the table, for the first time we sent abroad a larger value of articles from our factories than we imported, and the value of manufactured articles, partly or entirely completed, reached a total of 45.07 per cent of our total exports in the year 1911, while exports of all classes of foodstuffs had fallen to 19.13 per cent.

It will be noted from Table II, appended above, that while our food exports attained a maximum volume in 1898, they reached a maximum proportion about 1880. It is hardly necessary to go beyond these tables to show the change in the direction of the efforts of our producers and to explain the great increase in the cost of food.

These significant figures emphasize the increased pressure of the demands for subsistence upon the land and sources of supply. They also bring to light the law of diminishing returns under which, with every increment of supply, there is a substantial increase in cost.

REAL ESTATE AND BUILDINGS.

In addition, all expenses relating to housing or shelter have been revolutionized by changes in the value of real estate, to which must be added the greatly increased cost of materials for building and the higher cost of labor. No one should regret the higher compensation paid to wage earners. Social welfare is a greater advantage than cheap construction or cheap rents.

But labor cost as well as building material and values of real estate have very materially contributed to the present high cost of living. Higher values of land in cities are responsible for a very important part of the resulting conditions. These are due to the growth of population, to the concentration of activity in great centers, which cause a consequent increase in rent. The same increases, while not showing such phenomenal gains in percentages, have been no less general in rural land than in that located in cities. During the last 10 years values of farm lands in many localities have doubled, while the multiplication of real-estate values in growing cities is almost beyond belief.

The following table shows some of the increases in values in the city of Chicago, as determined by sales or leases.

[1] Figures furnished by Mr. W. K. Young, of Chicago.

While the figures just given of sensational advances in the price of real estate indicate the general tendency, yet it must be admitted that they are exceptional instances. Perhaps a better idea of the general rise in real-estate value may be obtained from the report of the comptroller of the State of New York, which shows the advance in the assessed valuation of all real property in the State of New York from 1870 to the present time. Table follows:

Assessed valuation of real estate in the State of New York for the periods mentioned.

NOTE.—The figure given for 1912 is that furnished by Hon. William Sohmer, comptroller for the State of New York, and is an estimate based on returns not fully tabulated.

Reference to the high cost of labor and of building material has already been made. In the classification of manufactured products in the report of the Bureau of Manufactures for 1912, lumber showed a greater increase than any other. There have been some exceptions to the increased cost, as in the case of brick, and progress has been made in the use of cement; but the general tendency has been in the direction of a very marked advance in the prices of all things required for construction. The increase in the cost of labor has been exceptionally large in the United States.

The following table shows some changes in the wages and hours of certain laborers, including especially those of the building trades, in which comparison is made of the relative increase of wages in the United States, Great Britain, Germany, and Bulgaria. By this table it will appear that the relative wages in 1907, as compared with 1900, for bricklayers are 135.1; for carpenters, 142.3; for plumbers, 146.5. In the same period there has been but slight advance in England, the compensation of those engaged in the building trades having increased but little, though Germany shows a material increase. The advance is greatest in the case of the bricklayers of Bulgaria, which illustrates the general trend.

United Kingdom	.4
Bulgaria	53.2

Carpenter's wages increased during the period as follows:

United States	42.3
Germany	28.7

Plumbers' wages increased as follows:

United States	46.5
Germany	33.6

The question has been much discussed whether increases in wages have kept pace with increased cost of living. As a general rule wages respond to changed conditions in values somewhat slowly. Increase or decrease in wages is resisted by employer or employee for a time in order to ascertain whether the change shall be permanent or not.

Figures given in Bulletin No. 77 of the Bureau of Labor, issued in July, 1908, indicate that the advance in wages has almost exactly kept pace with that of commodities. These increases, as already stated, have been most marked in the United States, yet there is no indication that there has been any disproportionate increase in the compensation of labor.

In connection with the tendency toward luxury and the greater scope and abundance of things which administer to human wants, one must consider the necessarily increased cost of almost every form of personal service. This fact assumes importance when we consider how large a share of modern operations are now accomplished or aided by invention or mechanism, and by the conduct of operations on a large scale. This constantly emphasizes the difference between results or operations which are carried on by machinery or en masse, and those which require manual labor or minute service.

DISTRIBUTION.

We are constantly confronted by the unequal development of cheapened processes which pertain to wholesale transactions and those which belong to distribution. The cost of hauling two tons of coal 150 miles by rail is much less than for hauling the same coal a half or even a quarter of a mile and unloading it at the dwelling house for which it is intended.

The best illustration of the excessive cost of distribution is the glaring disparity between the prices obtained by the producer, whether manufacturer or farmer, on the one hand, and the cost at retail or to the consumer. This disparity is nowhere better shown than by a comparison of the manufacturer's cost and the retail price for staple articles made of cotton and wool, such as quilts, men's underwear, ladies' hose, men's hose, ladies' vests, and men's suits. The manufacturer may gather his material from three continents and utilize all economies in the way of manufacture, but the retail price as set forth by the report of the Tariff Board shows an advance to the consumer of from 135.3 to 210 per cent. In the case of a three-piece man's suit the factory cost is figured at $12.41; the wholesale price is $16.50; the minimum retail price is $23. Assuming that the average retail price is $30, there is an increase of 141 per cent over the factory cost. These facts are shown in the table which follows:

Manufacturer's cost and retail price of certain articles as shown by the report of the Tariff Board on the cotton and woolen schedules.

In a computation recently made by an organization of commercial experts known as the Business Bourse of New York an effort was made to trace the increase in the number of those engaged in the work of distribution. Their estimate is that there were seven producers to one distributer in 1870 and three and six-tenths producers to one distributer in 1900. The per capita production by those engaged in productive employment in 1870 was $700; in 1900, $1,016. In 1870 the per capita distribution by one individual was $4,976; in the year 1900 it had fallen to $3,723, and the rather startling prediction is made that the time will come when those engaged in distribution will equal the number of those engaged in production.

This shows a remarkable change from the simple conditions which Benjamin Franklin advocated in 1785, when he wrote:

> If too many artificers and farmers turn shopkeepers, the whole quantity of that business divided amongst them may afford too small a share for each and occasion complaints that trade is dead. They may all suppose that it is owing to a scarcity of money, while, in fact, it is not so much from the fewness of buyers as from the excessive number of sellers that the mischief arises; and if every shopkeeper, farmer, and mechanic would return to the use use of his plow and working tools there would remain of widows and other women shopkeepers sufficient for the business, which might then afford them a comfortable maintenance.

One of the most notably distinctive features which makes distribution expensive at present is the extreme detail with which the whole work of bringing products to the ultimate purchaser is conducted. There has been no increase but rather a decline in the cost of carrying great quantities of commodities from the sources of production to centers of consumption. The difference which affects the cost of living is in bringing them to the door of the consumer. Fifty years ago merchants had no delivery wagons. The customer who desired to make a purchase went to the village or city store, obtained what he wished, and took it to his home. Now there is an elaborate system, with no end of expense and labor, in the care of packages and in their delivery at the home of the purchaser.

The retailer is by no means to be blamed for this condition. He is confronted at the very outset by increased rents, increased cost of service, the more exacting demands of his customers, both as regards quality and the handling of packages, all of which makes it necessary, if he sustains himself, to secure the greatest possible margin in his selling prices. In an important sense, the retailer is alike the representative and the victim of a faulty system of distribution. In every city of any considerable size the visitor may observe certain streets lined by small and sometimes inferior buildings devoted to the retail trade. In each of these shops and stores devoted to the sale of staple articles there must be several clerks to wait upon patrons. The average sales are comparatively small and, as the conduct of the business includes the delivery of articles sold to customers, there must be much duplication of effort. Stocks are usually small, and if perishable articles are sold there is an exceptional loss from decay and from goods undisposed of at the end of the season.

It requires little reflection to realize that in this present era of high wages and rents, contemporaneously with large-scale operations, such a method of transacting business is unprofitable and not in line with modern methods. It is not a careless forecast to predict that before many years these numerous small shops and stores will be displaced by larger buildings devoted to the sale of specific articles. There will still remain small shops for furnishing articles and services which require distinctive personal qualifications, such as the watchmaker, the pharmacist, perhaps, and any line of business where knowledge of a trade or special qualifications are required. A tendency is already manifest in large cities for these last-named occupations to gather in great arcades or buildings of considerable size.

On the other hand, the sale of staple articles of food, groceries, fruits, as well as articles of clothing and of hardware, will naturally be made in large establishments, in which purchases may be made on the most advantageous terms, and sales and distribution can be accomplished with the benefits which belong to wholesale transactions.

The telephone has already assisted in bringing the producer and consumer nearer together. The parcels post will no doubt contribute to the same result. It is doubtful whether the department stores will effect a lower cost of distribution, though they may have assisted in that regard. In the first place, in a large department store a great variety of articles are sold. Necessarily the profits on different commodities disposed of will be unequal. Small profits on some articles must be equalized by large profits on others. Those which can be more conveniently and profitably handled will have larger sales. There is a constant danger that those in charge of the different branches will manifest unequal capacity for the business. There may be an expert in crockery or glassware, while the one at the head of the department of gentlemen's furnishings may have only inferior qualifications for the place. The overhead charges are very large. Heavy expenditures are sometimes incurred to attract customers by amusements, such as concerts and vaudeville shows. Again, the department enjoys possibilities of monopoly, and where cheaper distribution can be obtained, a larger share of the profits will be claimed by the proprietor, so that the general public may realize only slight benefits.

Large establishments devoted to the distribution or sale of separate categories of commodities, possessed of the best facilities and methods for economical management, would seem to lead to the most probable solution of the present high cost of distribution. The sale of a great diversity of products has its advantages, and that method may be adopted, though greater economies would seem to accrue from the handling of distinct categories of articles.

Public markets are in use on a relatively small scale. They supply but a limited share of the demands of the consumer. The farmer or producer who brings his wares to these markets can not be expected to be actuated by altruistic motives. He will fix his price in accordance with the scale paid by the general public. For instance, if an article is sold at 20 cents a pound and the producer could, with profit, sell the same article in a public market for 12 cents, it is not to be anticipated that he will decrease his charges below the ordinary price of 20 cents, except in so far as it may be necessary for him to do so in order to obtain customers.

No doubt with a general system of markets, with sufficient stocks and a larger share of buyers, the play of competition would lead to a widely different result. The prices would then fall to a figure determined by a reasonable profit to the producer.

The establishment of cooperative societies has been much discussed. These have been adopted on a large scale in England and in Germany. In the latter country doubt has been expressed of their efficiency in securing lower prices to the consumer. Indeed, some German commercial writers, who have made a study of their operation, say that the principal benefit derived from them is the competition created and the check upon exorbitant prices by the regular dealers in the commodities which the cooperative societies handle. In England they not only undertake distribution, but on a large scale manufacture as well; and it is maintained that the result has been a very considerable reduction in cost.

That there is one very substantial objection to these cooperative societies can not be ignored. Different forms of business, all the operations of industry, succeed in proportion to the competency and fitness of those engaged in them. Usually the cooperative society involves the selection of untried men, or at least a greater or less proportion of men without experience, and necessitates turning aside from those who have been trained for mercantile pursuits to others who have no such qualifications. There is also a probably less degree of care and attention to business, a less facility in making progress and improvements, by those who represent a society than would be the case in stores or other lines of business conducted by the responsible owners.

In our present system of distribution very large amounts are expended for advertising. The statistics show the annual amount expended to be between $600,000,000 and $700,000,000. The following table apportions this:

NOTE.—Similar estimates were furnished by the Business Bourse, placing the total at $682,000,000 annually.

It goes without saying that this cost of advertising must be borne by the consumer, and oftentimes the expense of placing an article on the market by publicity is greater than the cost of production itself. The modern methods of advertising appeal to the consumer. Before the days when advertising had gained so notable a foothold the sale of goods by the manufacturer or jobber was promoted by the commercial traveler, who appealed not to the consumer, but to the merchant.

No doubt one effect of advertising is to increase sales. Otherwise the elaborate system now in vogue would not be undertaken. This increases the aggregate consumption, and hence the cost of living. On the other hand, it is maintained that advertisements bring before the public a higher grade of articles. Outside of mere routine advertising, which has no very different status from that which has existed for many years, its object is to exploit either an article of exceptional cheapness or one of exceptional quality, some novelty which has not thus far been used.

An important lesson in support of the general theory maintained in this discussion is to be derived from the history of advertising. It has been maintained that high prices were an incident of progress. It is only in a time of increasing consumption, of a desire for newer and better articles, that advertising could be successful. It is perfectly apparent that so large a bill would not be incurred for the exploitation of wares, except in a time when wealth is increasing and demands for improvement and luxury are keeping pace with it. All this goes to show the greater enjoyment and more exacting demands of modern life.

One of the serious influences which are tending to increase prices is that of price agreements of various sorts. It was the purpose of the Sherman Antitrust Act to prevent practices of this sort, and probably the most flagrant cases and the coarser devices for accomplishing this result have been abandoned. However, there can be little doubt that in fact this practice still continues in certain branches of trade. It is alleged that the so-called Gary dinners did away with competition and established uniform prices just as effectively as the older and more illegal form of agreements had done.

Various devices are now resorted to to eliminate competition and control prices. The most effective device has been that of hiding behind patent rights, which the courts have firmly upheld. Under a recent decision of the Supreme Court agreements based upon a patent right may extend even to controlling the supplies which may be used in connection with any patented article, thus requiring the user to buy supplies of a certain make and to pay the price imposed. It will be readily seen that in relation to a great variety of articles it will be entirely possible to protect price agreements by virtue of the patent laws.

Apparently the time has come when price agreements do not need to rest upon expressed contract of any kind. Certain brands of staple articles now appear to be sold at retail under a perfecly maintained price agreement when no formal agreement can be said to exist. These include footwear, articles of clothing, musical instruments, and similar articles of great variety. One method of securing compliance with the retail price fixed by the manufacturer is that of offering the retail dealer a special discount in case he will maintain the established price. Moreover, the time seems to have come, especially amongst large manufacturers and dealers, also in very considerable degree amongst smaller traders, when the firm conviction prevails that "competition does not pay," and it is their claim that price agreements benefit both the seller and the buyer. With such a spirit prevailing amongst dealers the flimsiest sort of an understanding will serve to establish prices.

In this connection it must be noted that the high cost of living attributable to distribution bears with most crushing weight upon those of limited means. They are compelled to purchase in limited quantities and can not take advantage of favorable conditions in the market. Compare, for instance, the position of a purchaser of ample means who buys a supply of anthracite coal for the following winter in the spring, when the price is lower, with that of the family that must buy fuel by the bucketful. Those of adequate incomes buy articles of food by the barrel or hundredweight and provide room for storage, while those who live, as it were, from hand to mouth are compelled to purchase for a single day or even a single meal.

WHAT WILL BE THE FUTURE OF PRICES?

This question is so fraught with uncertainties that it is difficult to offer any prognostications with confidence. Some anticipations, however, may be made with reasonable certainty.

REAL ESTATE.

There is no probability that real estate in any form will cease to increase in value. So long as there is increase in population and in the average consumption and requirements of the individual there will be an increased pressure upon the earth for subsistence and for space. The marvelous growth of cities will accentuate the increase in populous centers, and on the other hand there will be no cessation of the increase in the values of farm land.

In meeting the demand for farm products new fields will be developed. Fertilization and improved cultivation will be resorted to. These will increase the productive power of the land; but so far as regards the products of the Temperate Zone, especially meat and wheat, there is no indication that these means of increased supply will keep pace with the increasing demand. The best and most available agricultural lands have already been utilized. Improved cultivation entails, at least for some staple products, a greater cost than the proportionate return. Methods of transportation from remote fields will no doubt be improved. But the same lack of proportionate returns will no doubt be noticeable here.

In giving this generalization reference is had especially to wholesale prices. There is still an almost unlimited opportunity for cheapening prices in means of distribution. There may be some counteracting tendencies in values of real estate. A tendency is already noticeable in cities to go out into the suburbs and to utilize outlying localities by means of quicker and better facilities for transportation.

So far as residential location is concerned, the tendency between city and country is centripetal toward the city; in the city itself it is centrifugal, or directed toward outside localities where there is more room and better light and air.

The same tendency may become manifest in the location of certain trades and lines of manufacture. A number of factors may contribute to this result—the almost prohibitive price of lands in cities, the difficulty of obtaining light or water or some other essential for manufacturing. There is no reason why smaller towns which afford sufficient facilities for transportation should not be utilized for the location of factories, or, indeed, for certain branches of the wholesale trade. This is especially true of articles which are sold by correspondence or through commercial salesmen or advertising.

It is evident there will be an increased price for articles of which there is a disappearing or diminishing supply of raw material. This is perfectly obvious, and there are numerous articles essential for comfortable living the materials for which are becoming scanty.

THE COST OF LABOR.

It is not at all probable that the wages of labor will decrease. Indeed, that is not to be desired. As a result, partly of political and partly of social conditions, the situation of the wage earner has greatly improved in our own country, and it is agreed that this improvement is not only for his benefit but for the benefit of the Nation as a whole.

There is no more accurate barometer of business prosperity than the employment of labor. Universal employment means that the largest class of consumers is able to buy commodities, and thus create a demand for the products of the farm and the factory. As an indication also it shows clearly that factories and other enterprises are busily engaged.

INDICATIONS THAT LOOK TOWARD CHEAPNESS.

On the other hand, the triumphs of invention and improved mechanism are constantly making easier the task of producing a great variety of articles of utility; better utilization of capital and more improved methods of transacting business alike contribute to this result. Relatively speaking, at least, it is not probable that manufactured commodities will increase in cost unless there is a scarcity of the materials required. Every indication points rather to a decline.

THE INFLUENCE OF GOLD PRODUCTION.

Indications are not lacking that this very important influence in the present course of prices has reached its maximum. In the first place, there is a check in the increased annual production, which is extremely significant. The year 1902 showed a gain in gold production over 1901 of $36,000,000; in 1903, an increase of $31,000,000 over the preceding year; in 1904, of $20,000,000; and in 1905 of $33,000,000; passing to 1908, $30,000,000 in excess of the preceding year; but the increase in 1909 over 1908 was less than $12,000,000, and that of 1910 over 1909 less than a million, while that of 1911 over the preceding year was only $7,000,000. This shows in the last three years, and especially for 1910, a very marked falling off in increased gold production, and furnishes a basis for the conjecture that there has been such a rise in prices that enterprise and capital will—at least in a measure—begin to seek other directions. Indeed, South Africa is the only locality in which the increase has assumed importance in recent years.

It has already been stated in this connection that the effect of a great increase in the supply of precious metals on prices in time is neutralized. The great quantity is widely scattered; it is absorbed partly by nations where it has not been in any considerable use before. The growth of commerce and industry require the additional supply. Larger quantities are used for the ordinary transactions of life, larger bank reserves are maintained, and in every way the demands incident to a season of great progress square themselves with the situation created by increased supplies of gold.

REMEDIES.

It would be rash to predict an early return to low prices. All the great factors, which have only partially been portrayed, depend upon new conditions which have arisen, some of which are inseparably connected with substantial benefits to the human race. If prices have increased, human enjoyments have increased also.

In considering the question of remedies a note of caution is necessary, to the effect that no great reliance can be placed upon legislative action. While the enactment of laws by Congress and State legislatures gives promise of some degree of relief, the real source of the difficulty must be traced to a condition which is world-wide and embraces forces so potent that no political action can effectually meet the situation.

It is no doubt desirable that many rates of duties in our tariff schedule should be materially reduced and others removed entirely, but, as already stated, if such reductions are so drastic as to cause an entire or partial abandonment of local industries, the demand upon foreign supplies will cause an increase in prices both there and here. No real relief will be obtained and the diminished employment and restricted market at home will entail a disadvantage quite out of proportion to the benefits gained.

A proposition for reciprocity with Canada was adopted last year under which wheat, potatoes, and other numerous products of the farmer were to be admitted free. I confidently anticipate that at no distant date an adjustment of this general nature will be adopted between the United States and Canada. It should, of course, give equal regard to the agricultural interests so that, as far as possible, they may enjoy any possible benefit of decreased duties on manufactured articles; but no one can be sanguine that such removal of the duties on agricultural products brought in from Canada or from any country will cause any material decrease in prices. The effect would be somewhat similar to that created by the opening up of great fields in the West, though in view of the much larger and more rapidly increasing consumption of the present day the effect would by no means equal the result of the development of agricultural lands after the Civil War.

Free importations would aid in times of scarcity, would tend to prevent the control of the market by corners or absorption of supply, and would no doubt have some effect in the reduction of the cost of food products. But our own demand for these articles is so great, and shows such increases from year to year, that in connection with an increased demand the world over, the additional supplies available would have but very slight effect upon the prevalent level of prices.

Strict enforcement of the laws for the prevention of monopoly and any and all illegal practices relating to the control of prices will have a most salutary effect. At the same time it is by no means desirable to ignore the beneficial effects of large scale operations and the better utilization of capital and labor under modern methods which utilize by-products, secure economies, and prevent much waste in production and distribution. One object which should always be borne in mind is to so control great aggregations of capital as to retain at least the potentiality of competition and prevent the adoption of oppressive methods.

In the prosecution of large scale operations it is probable that many of the various processes from raw material through manufacture and distribution to the consumer will be prosecuted by one organization. However much we may decry this tendency, or however much we may lack control of industrial enterprises, we may be reasonably certain that this method will be adopted more and more in the future.

More intelligent and more adequate control must be exercised over great industrial and commercial organizations so that the full benefit of modern development in industry and commerce may accrue in proper measure to all classes of consumers. No adequate remedy will be attained until the same advance which has been made in production and in the diffusion of masses of commodities shall be applied to the minutest details of distribution. Our natural resources, much of which have been wasted or too largely absorbed by the few, must be more carefully utilized, and every possible means be taken not only to preserve a proper share of them for the future but to make them a heritage and a source of benefit to all classes of our population.

The increasing prices of farm products may stimulate a "back-to-the-farm" movement. It is a great economic law that effort and enterprise are directed toward those branches of endeavor which promise the greatest profit. The attractions of farm life have been greatly increased by rural free delivery, by the use of the telephone, by the development of good roads, a species of improvement in which there is an almost unlimited opportunity for further advancement. At any rate, more scientific methods of cultivation will be adopted and the average yield per acre will be increased. The wide gap which now exists between prices obtained for farm products and those which are charged to the consumer can be lessened, and thus a benefit conferred both on the farmer and the consumer.

No treatment of this subject is complete unless we recognize the marvelous progress and the abounding opportunities which belong to the American citizen, and the manifest disposition toward development along material lines. There have been instances in which the humble immigrant, coming from his native land to the New World in the hope of enjoying greater equality and opportunity, has achieved such success that he might build a palatial mansion far more stately than the baronial castle of his one-time overlord, and his wife might array herself in jewels and garments eclipsing the coronation robes of the queen. How wonderful have been the triumphs of the American financier and business man! Many can display a munificence far outshining—

> The wealth of Ormus and of Ind,
> Or where the gorgeous East, with richest hand,
> Showers on her kings barbaric pearl and gold.

But all this abundance has in it a menace of an extravagant enjoyment of our opportunities, and an avarice in which lurk dangers of decay. If there is any salutary lesson which we can derive from this present era of the high cost of living, it is that we should practice the old-time virtues of frugality and economy.

It has been said that nations like individuals have their periods of youth, of maturity, and of decay. The olden time is replete with the records of tribes which swept down from the mountain upon the plain and the valley and subdued those who had not the incentive to labor or the discipline of self-denial and effort of those who were nurtured and lived in more barren regions. In many instances the hardy stock of conquerors, after dwelling for a time in fertile lands and with more promising surroundings, in turn succumbed to luxury and to decay. Is there not this same danger that in industrial competition those who have a severe struggle for bread will gain advantages over us? The extravagance and profligacy which wealth sometimes breeds display a danger signal.

In the quickly changing course of events in this modern day there may be ground for apprehension that the same decay from stalwart national life and homely domestic virtues which required long ages in the past may occur in a few cycles of national existence.

In seeking a remedy for the present high prices and high cost of living we may dismiss many of the nostrums which have been proposed, for we are inevitably forced to the conclusion that tendencies quite beyond human control have led to the present situation. Nevertheless we can in a measure combat this tendency by the education of the individual to a higher standard of private virtue and civic interest. Every movement which tends in this direction not only aids our political life but helps to solve the problem of economics and of business. With the assurance that the American people have a surpassing fitness to meet all trying situations and afford an intelligent solution in any emergency, we may hope that the ultimate effect of present conditions will bring substantial benefit rather than harm.

APPENDIX I.

Extracts from reports of American consular officers abroad, together with tables of price ranges in various foreign cities, gathered and compiled by Mr. O. P. Austin, of the Bureau of Statistics, Department of Commerce and Labor:

EUROPE.

ENGLAND, BRITISH ISLES.

For some months there has been a steady increase in the cost of some of the principal articles connected with the grocery and provision trades, which has made the cost to the consumer higher. Sugar has been steadily advancing. Butter has increased in price $7.30 a hundredweight as compared with last year. (Consul Albert Halstead, Birmingham.)

The increased cost of meat is symptomatic of almost every item that figures in the national larder. (Consul Albert Halstead, Birmingham.)

While there has been a moderate advance in the rate of wages, there has been a much greater advance in the cost of living. (Consul W. C. Hamm, Hull, England.)

During the past five years there has been an advance of 20 per cent in purchase price of the following necessities in the markets of the Southampton consular district: Fresh beef, mutton, bacon, ham, butter, eggs, fruit, tea, dried fruits, sugar, coffee, fuel. (Consul A. W. Swaim, Southampton, England.)

The London Daily Mail calls attention to the increase during the last 15 years in the prices of almost all articles of food which enter into the daily consumption of the great masses of people in London. (Consul General J. L. Griffiths, London.)

The Cooperative Wholesale Societies (Ltd.) have prepared the following table showing the increased cost of certain articles in the United Kingdom since 1908:

(In cents per pound.)

Year.	Bacon and hams.	Butter.	Cheese.	Lard.	Flour.	Meal.	Sugar.	Tea.
1898	9.92	22.70	10.48	6.48	2.78	2.46	2.98	32.34
1910	16.38	25.74	13.12	13.66	2.45	2.32	4.06	30.93

(Consul General J. L. Griffiths, London.)

According to several of the leading papers of Great Britain, the cost of living in luxuries and necessities, food, clothing, and transport "has increased enormously in price during the past nine years." At the present time the increase over 1902 is in many instances more than 25 per cent, and the average increase in 22 leading commodities (as worked out by the Economist) is 23 per cent. Since the coronation of King Edward VII the price of foodstuffs has gone up a fraction over 2 shillings (48.6 cents) on the pound sterling ($4.866). (Consul H. D. Van Sant, Dunfermline.)

GERMANY.

Living conditions in Germany, as in most parts of the civilized world, are seriously affected by the continued rise in the prices of food products, many having advanced far above all previous records. (Consul General A. M. Thackara, Berlin.)

During the five years last past the cost of living in this part of Germany and throughout the Empire has materially increased. This increase in numerous instances has caused privations. (Consul Frank Dillingham, Coburg.)

There was a marked advance in the prices of almost every kind of food during 1911. Counting the average prices for the decade 1889 to 1898 as 100, the following are the relative averages for prices in main groups of products for 1909, 1910, and 1911:

Classes of products.	1909	1910	1911
Grains	119.05	106.55	112.02

Textile products	124.29	131.77	138.77
Minerals	118.76	121.17	131.11

The general index price for 39 articles was 5,148 in 1911, as compared with 4,662 in 1910 and 4,724 in 1909. (Consul General A. M. Thackara, Berlin.)

HIGHER PRICES OF FOODSTUFFS.

The increased cost of living due to the higher prices of foodstuffs is the cause of much complaint in Germany. The advances shown by the most important articles of food during the past year are shown by the following table of wholesale prices:

FRANCE.

The increased cost of the ordinary foodstuffs in Paris and throughout northern France has become the most generally absorbing topic of public interest. The prices of meats and produce of all kinds advanced during the month of September, 1911, to figures unprecedented in the markets of Paris. (Consul General Frank H. Mason, Paris.)

The increased cost of living is seriously felt in the city of Lyon, and there has been a great deal of agitation among the local labor unions to find some means to check a further rise in prices. (Consul C. B. Hurst, Lyon.)

The cost of many articles of food increased considerably during the past decade, among the articles being the following, the price representing 2.2 pounds: Bacon, salted, 46 to 48 cents; beef, ordinary cuts, 42 to 48 cents; and ham, 46 to 52 cents. During the decade the price of chickens increased from 68 to 77 cents each, and eggs, per dozen, from 23 to 34 cents. (Consul General Skinner, Marseille, France.

The cost of living in this city has considerably increased in the past 10 years, and is constantly the subject of French comment and continual complaint on the part of those whose salaries remain unchanged. Moreover, there is every indication that the augmentation of prices will continue. (Consul J. E. Dunning, Havre.)

The extremely high price of all food articles was much higher in France in November, 1911, than in the United States. The following table shows French food prices in November, 1900, 1911, and the comparative average American prices during the latter period:

	Beef.	Lamb.	Potatoes.	Eggs.	Butter.	Milk.	Flour.	Sugar.	Tea.

United States, November, 1911	25	20	1½	40	40	8	4	7	60

(Consul James E. Dunning, Havre, France.)

Not only the native Spaniards in Seville but also the foreign residents are confronted by the high cost of living here. Local conditions are peculiar and a foreigner is inclined to feel that luxuries are sometimes cheap and necessities invariably expensive. (Vice Consul Harris N. Cookingham, Seville.)

Any comparative study of the cost of living must naturally take account of the comparative well-being of the two peoples, and no report on living conditions in France could be complete without reference to the very remarkable capacity of the people to achieve comfort at a low cost. Despite the very high price of food, it is still possible for the small French family to live happily, according to its own standards, at a much lower rate than would be paid in the United States for the support of an equal number of individuals.

The difference, however, does not come out of the fixed charges of life, such as rent, food, clothing, and fuel, but is created by comparative luxury which applies to the similar class in America. Where the American family of similar class tends to live up to or beyond its income in supplying itself with household luxuries, such as musical instruments, electric lights, ornamental furniture, labor-saving kitchen appliances, illustrated periodicals, modern bathrooms, patented foods in packages, and the many other characteristic American adjuncts, which are placed in such abundance before the most modest households by clever and persistent advertising, the French family of equal station has so far considered all such objects as beyond its reach. The real source of the difference is in the character of the people, average ambition in France being devoted to living comfortably on a comparatively fixed income, whereas in the United States income is regarded as ever subject to increase through effort.

It must be said, however, that within the last five years France has shown, in common with other Continental countries, that decided heightening of the popular appetite for luxury which has been at the bottom of the advanced cost of living the world over. A very marked taste for minor luxuries is making itself felt, and it is quite evident that the difference in favor of lower cost of living in France tends to disappear in consequence. The average family is less and less satisfied to live under the old conditions in which economy rather than physical comfort was the rule. (Consul James E. Dunning, Havre.)

SPAIN.

Much popular dissatisfaction with the high cost of foodstuffs in Spain. (Consul Robert Frazer, jr., Valencia.)

The problem of greatly increased cost of living is as acute here as in the United States. All the necessities of life have gone up steadily in price, and there does not seem to be any immediate relief. (Consul E. J. Norton, Malaga.)

Living is more expensive in Madrid than in any other city in Spain. Rents are about 50 per cent higher and other things about 25 per cent. This is easily accounted for by the fact that nothing is raised in the vicinity of the city and that it is the home of practically all the wealthy people of the Kingdom. (Consul Charles L. Hoover, Madrid.)

NETHERLANDS.

Prices of important foodstuffs increased 16 to 55 per cent in 12 years. The world tendency to higher prices is a partial cause. (Consul F. W. Mahin, Amsterdam.)

The material increase in the price of foodstuffs during the past six months * * * is in the main only a continuation of a movement which has existed for the past 15 years. Since then—1896—prices have steadily mounted. (Consul F. W. Mahin, Amsterdam.)

SWITZERLAND.

Beef, veal, pork, and bacon have gone up in price 25 per cent since January, 1905. Almost every article used in the household has gone up in the same period. So sharp has been the pinch of high prices on the working classes that the Government has decided to permit the importation of frozen beef. (Consul D. I. Murphy, St. Gaul, Switzerland.)

GREECE.

The same amount of money expended by a family per annum in Greece and the United States would secure in the latter country a larger degree of the comforts and luxuries of life than in the former. (Consul A. B. Cooke, Patras, Greece.)

ITALY.

The economic conditions of life are becoming, it is alleged, more and more difficult to the poorer classes. Lodgings of an unpretentious nature have materially advanced in rentals; prices of food, wine, and other commodities have increased; and there has been a corresponding advance in the cost of cotton goods, shoes, and other necessary industrial products. The middle classes also suffer much from similar conditions, especially those living on small incomes or pensions. (Consul Long, Venice, Italy.)

In no place in Italy is the increased cost of living more keenly felt than in Milan. * * * The price of meat is steadily increasing. * * * House rents have advanced 30 per cent in three years. (Consul C. M. Caughy, Milan.)

The price of hogs in Milan has reached a figure critically high, and it shows no signs of declining. (Vice Consul J. B. Young, Milan.)

The past few years have witnessed a general increase in the cost of living throughout Italy. (Consul General J. A. Smith, Genoa.)

The cost of living has increased very rapidly at Leghorn during the last two years, especially as regards food products. Wages of factory employees and of common laborers, including domestic servants, are to-day 75 per cent higher than in the spring of 1909.

The following list gives the prices of the ordinary items which enter into the cost of living:

Men's clothing sold in 1909 for $11.58 to $16.40 per suit and in 1911 for $13.50 to $17.37. In 1909 a five-room apartment rented for $4.82 to $6.75 per month and in 1911 for $6.75 to $9.65. Apartments of 10 to 12 rooms rented from $9.65 to $15.44 per month in 1909 and $13.50 to $19.30 in 1911. Domestic servants received $2.32 to $2.86 per month in 1909 and $4.83 to $6.75 in 1911. (Consul Frank Deedmeyer, Leghorn.)

AUSTRIA.

Since 1907 the following articles have advanced in price as indicated by the percentage: Lard, 17; butter, 20; flour, 50; potatoes, 25; bread, 40; meal, 60; sugar, 20; veal, 12; pork, 10. In fact, every other article entering into household expenses has advanced in price. (Consul J. I. Britton, Prague, Austria.)

In common with the rest of the world, Austria has been affected by the increased cost of living and complaints are made on every hand. Unrest over the increased cost of living showed itself in a nation-wide protest against the price of meat. (Consul Charles Denby, Vienna.)

In all parts of Austria meetings have been held recently to protest against the continuous advance in prices of all kinds of foodstuffs. * * * Prices had advanced so rapidly in all food products as to have the effect of creating most distressing conditions. (Consul W. J. Pike, Reichenberg.)

The cost of living has increased rapidly in the last 10 years in western Bohemia. (Consul Will L. Lowrie, Carlsbad.)

HUNGARY.

The most disquieting feature of the year—1911—was the further rise in the cost of living—an average increase in the value of the necessities of life estimated at 18 per cent. This is particularly remarkable when one considers the steady upward trend of prices since 1907, and unless something is done to relieve the situation those people who depend upon fixed incomes for their sustenance will soon be brought to the verge of absolute want. This applies especially to Government employees, of whom there are over 300,000 in Hungary. The prices of the necessities of life are considerably higher here than in the United States. The average price of beef carcasses here in 1911 was $15.31 per 100 pounds and of hogs $14.95 per 100 pounds. (Consul General Paul Nash, Budapest.)

DENMARK.

From statistics prepared for the Danish Rigsdag in 1908, before the introduction of a bill suggesting the increase of salary for certain Danish officials, it appears that the cost of the necessaries of life during the six previous years had increased 15 to 20 per cent and that wages had increased in the same period 10 to 15 per cent.

The following statement shows the average price of leading foods, per Danish pound (1.1 American pounds), in Copenhagen in 1905, 1907, and 1909 (Minister Maurice Francis Egan):

RUSSIA.

The increased cost of living throughout Russia is perhaps felt more keenly in Moscow than in any other city of the Empire. Conditions have become so serious that many plans have been mooted for the relief of the people. (Consul General J. H. Snodgrass, Moscow.)

ASIA.

CHINA.

The Shensi people are complaining this year that prices are gradually advancing, due to the transportation of hundreds of cartloads of brass cash from Honanfu to the Wei Basin. In eastern China the brass cash are being largely displaced by copper coins. In Shensi, Kansuh, and southern Shensi brass cash is still the coin of the realm. It requires 15 pounds of this brass cash to make the equivalent of $1 United States currency. (Consul Arnold, Amoy, China.)

It is a matter of grave concern to observe from year to year the increasing cost of living which, of course, includes every item of household expenses. (Consul J. C. McNally, Nanking, China.)

JAPAN.

During July and August, 1911, the price of rice on the Tokyo rice and other grain exchanges advanced to nearly $2 per bushel, a price never before reached in Japan. The price gradually advanced until on August 9 it reached approximately $2.07 per bushel. The rise was attributed to the clever and so-called "artificial" manipulation of brokers on the exchange, and not to the laws of supply and demand, as claimed by the brokers. The retail price of cleaned rice has advanced 40 to 45 per cent above these figures, being nearly 50 per cent higher than in 1910. (Consul General Thomas Sammons, Yokohama, Japan.)

According to an article in Osaka Asahi, prices have gone up in Japan over twofold in the last 20 years. * * * Compared with the advance in prices in other countries, the Japanese rate of advance has been about 2 per cent greater than that in London and New York. (Consul G. N. West, Kobe.)

The Japanese press comments favorably upon the telegraphic announcement that the President of the United States favors an international conference regarding the question of the high cost of living. The Japanese native press frequently attributes the increased cost of living to the overproduction of gold. It is stated, as set forth in the appended table, that Tokyo exceeds all other cities of the world in the increase in the cost of living. (Consul General Thomas Sammons, Yokohama, Japan.)

SYRIA.

A limited supply of edibles has already caused a great increase in prices and considerable hardships to the poorer classes. Meats have risen over 30 per cent, and butter in proportion; flour, 20 per cent; potatoes, 25 per cent; fruits and vegetables, 50 per cent; fuel, 50 per cent; and clothing, 20 per cent. (Consul J. B. Jackson, Aleppo, Syria.)

Outside of staple articles, such as coffee, sugar, petroleum, and a few others of less importance, the cost of living has increased 20 to 50 per cent within the past year. The prices of meats have risen over 30 per cent, and butter in proportion; flour, 20; potatoes, 25; vegetables, 50; fruits, 50; clothing, 20; fuel, 50; and rents, from 25 to 40 per cent. Household servants and similar employees demand from 50 to 75 per cent more than formerly, and common labor has increased from 25 to 35 per cent. (Consul Hollis, Beirut, Syria.)

ASIA MINOR.

One of the inexplicable things in connection with this country is the remarkable increase in the price of everything, and there is not one article that goes into any of the relations of life that has not almost doubled in price during the past five years. (Consul W. W. Masterson, Harput, Asia Minor.)

AFRICA.

CAPE COLONY.

The cost of living in Port Elizabeth is high, and would equal that of American cities of equal size. (Consul E. A. Wakefield, Port Elizabeth, Cape Colony.)

AUSTRALIA.

In the last few years much has been heard of the increased cost of many household commodities, and the question is one which touches the interests of all. (Consul Magellsen, Melbourne, Australia.)

During the past 10 years the increase in the cost of living in New South Wales amounts to an average of 20 per cent. The tariff has had nothing to do with the increase in price of meat; but of all advances there is none more striking than the advance in coal. It costs more to furnish a house now than it did in 1900. (Vice Consul General H. D. Baker, Sydney.)

NORTH AMERICA.

CANADA.

Notwithstanding abundant crops, there has been a decided rise in the price of farm and animal products but not in wages in the Province of Prince Edward Island. (Consul Frank Deedmeyer, Canada.)

MEXICO.

The cost of living in the city has doubled during the past 10 years, and only the well-to-do can afford to buy foreign food products. Laborers' wages have advanced from 38 cents in 1893 to 62 cents in 1911 for 10 hours' work. The increases in clerks' salaries have not kept pace with the advance in laborers' pay, and they range from about $25 to $75 per month. Mechanics earn $1 to $2 per day. (Consul General Canada, Vera Cruz, Mexico.)

Retail prices of provisions at Vera Cruz have steadily advanced in cost to the consumer for years, with no prospect of ever resuming their former level. Wages and salaries have not kept pace with the increased cost of living. (Consul W. W. Canada, Vera Cruz, Mexico.)

SOUTH AMERICA.

The high cost of the first necessities of life was no doubt a prime factor in the year's labor difficulties. The price of second-quality bread advanced 70 per cent in 10 years. (Consul General R. M. Bartleman, Buenos Aires.)

The cost of living has increased greatly in Chile during the last four years, which has made it very hard for the working people. (Consul A. A. Winslow, Valparaiso, Chile.)

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BRISTOW. I hope the Senator will withhold that motion.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will withdraw it for the present.

Mr. BRISTOW. I understand that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] desires to address the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think he does not wish to go on this evening.

Mr. THORNTON. I am much obliged to the Senator from Kansas, but the hour is late, nearly all Senators have gone away, and I am perfectly willing to let it go over.

Mr. BRISTOW. Should we not have an executive session, then?

SEVERAL SENATORS. Very well.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BRISTOW. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 30, 1912.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite and eternal spirit, father of all souls, we thank Thee for the precious thought taught and exemplified in the life and character of the Jesus of Nazareth which tends to solidify all nations into one family; that what hurts one nation hurts all the peoples of the world; what helps one helps Thy children everywhere; hence our hearts go out in sympathy for the stricken and mourning people of Japan in the loss of their beloved Emperor who has led them through all the vicissitudes attending their country for 40 years, ever onward and upward, to the betterment of conditions in the home, society, and government. Teach them that God lives and reigns in the hearts of men. Grant, O most merciful Father, that they may find in the new Emperor one who will lead them on to the betterment of conditions in the arts of peace, happiness, and good will, and Thine be the praise in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5545) providing for the issuing of patent to entrymen for homesteads upon reclamation projects.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following order:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate communicate to the House of Representatives an attested copy of the answer of Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States for the third judicial circuit, to the articles of impeachment.

STREET RAILWAY, TERRITORY OF HAWAII.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 18041, with a Senate amendment, and to concur in the amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There is a special order to-day.

The SPEAKER. The legislative situation is that there is a special order giving the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] right of way with the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That bill is H. R. 20728.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia says it will only take a minute in this case. If the gentleman from Texas will yield to the gentleman from Virginia, why, the Chair is willing to entertain the request.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I withhold, as I understand this is merely to correct a mistake.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18041) granting a franchise for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a street railway system in the district of South Hilo, county of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii.

The SPEAKER. What is the amendment?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. To insert the word "freight."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Senate amendment was reported.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I desire to say that the word "freight" was in the bill when it was first reported from the Committee on the Territories. In some way it was not printed, and the committee ordered a reprint in order to get that word in, and when the bill passed the House in some way the original print was passed instead of the reprint, and the bill went to the Senate, and there the word "freight" was inserted in it because the House wanted it done and the Senate thought it proper it should be done. That is the only amendment to the bill.

Mr. MANN. Is it not rather an important amendment?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It is.

Mr. MANN. The bill as read to the House, a copy of the bill which I had as reported to the House, did not contain the word "freight."

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The committee intended that word to be in the bill, and I believe the House thought it was there at the time it was passed.

Mr. MANN. I am sure the House did not think it.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. At any rate, it ought to be there, and the Senate has put it in. The fact that the word was in the bill as reported was discussed when the matter was before the House, because I remember stating that the only objection to this bill came from a steam railroad that this electric line was to parallel for a short distance, and that the steam road did not want the electric line to have the right to carry freight. This amendment gives that right, and without this amendment it might not have the right to carry freight. With this amendment left out the steam railroad will have accomplished by a mistake what it could not accomplish directly.

Mr. MANN. The steam railroad had no occasion to accomplish anything in the House——

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It tried to do it.

Mr. MANN. Because the committee reported the street railway franchise without the word "freight" in it.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It was reported with the word "freight" in it, but in the printing of the bill the word "freight" was left out, and then the committee ordered a reprint with the word "freight" in it, and by some mistake when the bill passed the House the original print was passed instead of the reprint.

Mr. MANN. Of course the committee did not have any authority to order a reprint. The print of a bill when it is reported to the House is not made by the committee but by the House. This bill was not printed with the word "freight" in it.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The second print had the word "freight" in.

Mr. MANN. Another print was made that Members of the House did not have and the Clerk will not have. We got the printed bill as reported, and we are entitled to believe that is the print of the bill as reported. Now, this is a very important matter, as to whether a street car franchise should include freight. I am not going to object to the request, but it seems to me a very careless way of enacting legislation.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The carelessness was not mine or that of the Committee on Territories.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table this bill and concur in the Senate amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 16518. An act for the relief of the Fifth-Third National Bank of Cincinnati, Ohio; and

H. R. 18041. An act granting a franchise for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a street railway system in the district of South Hilo, county of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution of the following title:

S. J. Res. 122. Joint resolution providing for the payment of the expenses of the Senate in the impeachment trial of Robert W. Archbald.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 20728, the special order for this morning.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20728) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to consider this bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I think that order has already been made by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. I think not. That would restrict the time of debate to five minutes to any Member who obtained the floor. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] desires some time and I might need some time myself.

The SPEAKER. The RECORD shows that this order was agreed to on July 25, 1912, and it states:

On motion of Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, by unanimous consent, Ordered, That on Tuesday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the bill H. R. 20728, with Senate amendments, be taken from the Speaker's table and considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that all the Senate amendments to this bill be disagreed to and conferees be appointed on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] asks unanimous consent that this bill be taken from the Speaker's table and all the Senate amendments disagreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is already taken from the Speaker's table under the order. Now, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] desires time to discuss one of the amendments. I suggest he take the time now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think there should be a limitation in this time, and I hope before the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] yields the floor that he will insist on an agreement as to time, and hold the floor and yield it himself.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I believe under the rule I am entitled to an hour, and I think that is all we should devote to the bill.

Mr. MANN. Under the rules the gentleman would be entitled to five minutes.

The SPEAKER. If it is considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, undoubtedly the five-minute rule prevails. That is one of the chief objects of considering it in that way.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. This unanimous-consent order that was obtained was under an arrangement made by the chairman of the committee and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] by which it was understood the gentleman from Colorado was to have some time to discuss the amendment upon which I understand he desires to make a motion to concur.

Mr. MANN. It was understood he was to have an hour's time.

The SPEAKER. There was something said about an hour. There is not any question about that, although the memory of the Chair concerning it is somewhat hazy.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That was on yesterday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There was nothing said. If the suggestion had been made, I would have objected.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That was a private arrangement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], and I will say to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that, so far as the chairman of the committee and other members of the committee are concerned, I think they are opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado, but they will consume very few minutes, even if the gentleman from Colorado is given an hour.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My objection to this matter is that there are four important bills here on the Speaker's table that ought to go to conference—three tariff bills and the sundry civil bill—and I think no lengthy delay ought to be occasioned. I hope the gentleman can agree on a reasonable time for debate.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Let the gentleman have 30 minutes by unanimous consent, if the House will agree to that, and I think we will not need that much time in reply on our side.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I really understood last night that there was a tentative agreement that I should have an hour in which to present this matter.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the other day when this matter was up I first objected to sending this bill to conference without consideration, in the temporary absence of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER]. It was stated then privately among gentlemen that he desired an hour's time, and it was agreed among them that he ought to have the hour's time if the bill can be disposed of from the Speaker's table; and it was only in that way that unanimous consent was granted, and I think he should have his hour's time.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We would be willing, I think, on our side to accept 15 minutes if the gentleman will agree to use only 45 minutes on his side. It is only one amendment.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. So far as the amendment is concerned on which the gentleman from Colorado desires to make a motion to concur, I think the debate ought to be limited to an hour, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] to have 45 minutes and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] to control 15 minutes. I do not know how much time other gentlemen may desire in which to discuss this bill as to any other amendments. So far as I am concerned, I do not desire to discuss any amendment.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to that arrangement, unless there is going to be unlimited time consumed with other amendments, and if we are going to make an agreement as to division of time, I think there should be an entire agreement as to that division.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. My suggestion was only with reference to this particular amendment. I do not know that there is any other amendment to the bill that any gentleman desires to debate.

Mr. MANN. There are several amendments in the bill that I desire to discuss. I am perfectly willing to take a limited time.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What time does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] desire?

Mr. MANN. Under the circumstances, 15 minutes. Possibly I will not use that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. An hour and a quarter. Would that be satisfactory, then?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think so, if the gentleman asks that all debate on the proposition be closed at a quarter of 1.

Mr. MANN. There are 57 amendments to this bill——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate be closed on the bill and amendments, and final vote be taken at 15 minutes to 1, and the previous question be considered as ordered at that time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] asks unanimous consent that debate on this bill and amendments close at 15 minutes before 1 o'clock, at which time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. MANN. What is the request?

The SPEAKER. That the debate on this bill and amendments close at 15 minutes to 1 o'clock, and at that time the previous question be considered as ordered.

Mr. MANN. How is the time to be controlled?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Fifteen minutes by myself, 15 minutes by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and 45 minutes by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. MANN. Fifteen minutes to me?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Would that still give the right to move to concur after the previous question?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] intends to move to concur in amendment No. 91.

The SPEAKER. As at present advised, the Chair thinks after the previous question is ordered it does not cut out a motion to concur.

Mr. MANN. It certainly does not.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER. Reserving the right to object, I want to be clear about how this time is to be divided.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Fifteen minutes on the part of the committee, 15 minutes on the part of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and 45 minutes on the part of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, may I ask if it is not rather unusual, when the Indian appropriation bill is to be considered, that the committee is to have 15 minutes, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] a like amount, and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] 45 minutes?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We are trying to arrive at an agreement, so as to save time.

Mr. MILLER. That may all be true, but several other members of the committee may have something that they care to say on the same question that was raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. I do not care to say anything, so far as I am concerned, but if the gentleman from Illinois is to have 15 minutes, which seems to be somewhat incongruous, and if the arrangement is made in order to accommodate him, I think it is entirely right, yet I do not think——

Mr. MANN. I am entitled to 15 hours, if I care to take it, under the rules.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] is looking out for his State, and——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER. I object to that arrangement.

Mr. ROUSE. Regular order!

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Speaker, we shall have to proceed under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MANN. I give notice now that there will be no more bills taken from the Speaker's table by unanimous consent and disagreed to if such an arrangement as this is not kept.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. When the gentleman from Illinois will point out arrangements that are made in this House they will be observed, but when the gentleman makes a private arrangement without the knowledge of the floor leader on this side he can not expect that it will be observed. The suggestion came from that side of the House, and——

Mr. MANN. This bill was taken from the Speaker's table the other day by unanimous consent, with the distinct statement that the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] should have an hour's time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will refer to that statement in the RECORD, the arrangement will be observed.

Mr. MANN. It may not be in the RECORD. If private arrangements made in good faith can not be observed to the conduct of a bill, we will have the regular order all the time.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I want to submit a request for unanimous consent, and that is that we have one hour and a half of debate, 15 minutes of which shall be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], 45 minutes by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER], and 30 minutes by the committee.

The SPEAKER. That would run to 1 o'clock, instead of 15 minutes to 1.

Mr. CARTER. Yes; it would last 15 minutes longer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] asks unanimous consent that this debate close at 1 o'clock. The Chair supposes that the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] as to the previous question goes with it?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I understood that he requests certain time.

The SPEAKER. Yes. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] asks unanimous consent that debate on these amendments and this conference report close at 1 o'clock, and that at that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered and that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] shall have 15 minutes, the committee 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] 45 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to make this statement. I desire to give gentlemen on the floor of this House a reasonable opportunity to consider these bills. I have no desire to do otherwise. But, with four important bills awaiting the action of the House to go to conference, which, if not disposed of, will delay the final adjournment of this Congress, I want gentlemen to understand from now on that if they desire to make a division of time by agreements on the floor of this House and want this side of the House to carry out such agreements, they must either put them in the RECORD or communicate with the floor leader on this side of the House.

Mr. MANN. Then I shall make no private agreements of any kind, after this bill is disposed of, with the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the gentleman is right about that. I do not think they should be made.

Mr. MANN. They are made frequently with this side by the gentleman from Alabama, and carried out.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. It was stated that the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], to the effect that at 1 o'clock the previous question be considered ordered, should be a part of the request made by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER]. Is there objection to that? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Before that begins, 5 minutes' time has gone. We can not have 15 minutes and 30 minutes and 45 minutes by 1 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. That will make it 5 minutes after 1 o'clock.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, amendment No. 91 is the amendment that is objected to by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER]. That amendment reads in this way:

(91) That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the administrator of the estate of John W. West, deceased, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States standing to the credit of the Cherokee Nation of Indians, the sum of $5,000 and interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from September 16, 1884, in full payment of the award made by the commission appointed pursuant to the authority contained in the seventh article of the treaty with the Cherokees promulgated August 17, 1846, and which award was approved by the Secretary September 16, 1884, and his action reaffirmed April 26, 1886.

This matter has been before Congress for many, many years. I hold in my hand a statement from the Secretary of the Interior, dated July 24, 1912, in which this language is used:

Amendment No. 91, page 35, beginning with line 7, authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to pay $5,000 to the administrator of the estate of John W. West, together with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from September 16, 1884, in full payment of the award made by the commission appointed pursuant to the authority contained in the seventh article of the treaty with the Cherokees, promulgated August 17, 1846, and which award was approved by the Secretary of the Interior September 16, 1884, and since reaffirmed. This claim has been pending before the department, this office, and Congress for a great many years. It has been carefully investigated and reconsidered a number of times. D. W. C. Duncan, commissioner on the part of the Cherokee Nation, and J. Q. Tufts, United States Indian agent, appointed pursuant to the seventh article of the treaty of 1846, reported in favor of the claim of the heirs of John W. West in the sum of $5,000, together with a "moderate rate of interest" thereon.

The Secretary of the Interior says in regard to a similar bill, on which he reported on December 26, 1911, that—

The department during the last 25 years has made a number of reports on the claim in question. The department, in its report dated December 26, 1911, said that "in view of the history of this claim, the action heretofore made thereon, and the long delay in the prosecution thereof," it would not be justified in recommending the passage of H. R. 6544.

That bill (H. R. 6544) is in the exact language of the amendment No. 91, proposed to be concurred in by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER]. If we concur in this amendment, we do it over the objection of the department, made in a letter dated Washington, D. C., March 3, 1910, in which we find this language:

The claim of certain heirs of John W. West was so interwoven with this case that the record is very voluminous. Bills were introduced in Congress for the relief of the heirs of John W. West on at least two occasions, but were never passed. Nothing in the record shows that these improvements were ever appraised at $42,000, as alleged by the attorneys in this case.

The case having been fully considered and long since closed, it is not thought that any action should be taken in the matter. There is nothing in the record to show that E. C. Alberty, who appears to have employed Messrs. Kight and Lee, is in any way related to any of the parties to the claim. Bluford West was without children, and Nancy Markham, his former wife, also appears to have died without issue. It has been held that John W. West, being an emigrant Cherokee, had no title and had never been awarded any part of the estate either by Congress or by any action of the Cherokee Nation, and if Alberty claims as an heir of the John W. West estate, there is nothing due him.

Very respectfully,

JESSE E. WILSON, Assistant Secretary.

In the face of these adverse reports the Senate has put on this appropriation bill amendment No. 91, for the purpose of taking out of the treasury of the Cherokee Nation $5,000 and paying this old stale claim. The Senate has also added amendments amounting to between $7,000,000 and $8,000,000. Many of these amendments are claims similar to this. If this House is willing to pass this West claim, then it instructs your committee in effect to admit the rest of these claims, amounting to several million dollars, as proper legislation on this Indian appropriation bill.

This class of amendments has no place on an appropriation bill, and should not be considered here. This West bill is on the Private Calendar of this House and can be called up under the rules of the House, when it can be thoroughly discussed and its merits can be fully understood and discussed by the House. We should not submit to these claims being placed upon our appropriation bills in the other body in violation of our rules and brought here, as is done in this case, in the hope that we will have to take them as a whole or reject them as a whole.

I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, it is early in the morning and I trust that your eyes are clear. I want simply to brush the cobwebs away from this proposition. I want to address myself first to the lawyers of this body, and next I want to address myself to the laymen in behalf of the justice of this claim.

There are many duties devolving upon Members of Congress. The amount of money involved in this claim is small, $5,000 with interest, amounting in all to $10,000, and I do not believe there is any lawyer in this body who would have undertaken to go through this record and look at it from a lawyer's standpoint for as much money as there is involved in it.

I want to begin by saying that while it is an old claim, and laches has been set up as an objection against it, I am going to develop the fact that the laches has been upon the part of the Cherokee Nation and the Government of the United States, and was not chargeable to the claimants who are now asking for this relief. Not one of these claimants is a constituent of mine. I do not know one of them personally. I was chosen as the chairman of a subcommittee to examine this claim, and I want to say in this connection that before I was honored with membership upon the Indian Committee I discussed this case with the chairman of the committee, who in 1909 put in a similar bill, of which this is a verbatim copy, for the allowance of this claim, and when he replies I am going to ask him to tell us what change has come over the spirit of his dreams to make him reverse the judgment that he formed when he introduced that bill in behalf of these claimants whose claim he is now opposing.

Something has been said to the effect that this claim should not be paid because John W. West was not a Western Cherokee; that he was an Eastern Cherokee, and therefore did not come within the treaty; and that the award made by the commission, regularly appointed pursuant to said treaty, in favor of these claimants may be disregarded on that account. Upon that point some proof has been offered that some children of John W.

West were put upon the roll of the Eastern Cherokees; but I have a letter, written day before yesterday by the commissioner, showing that the original claimant, John W. West and his children, were enrolled in 1851 by the Cherokee authorities as Western Cherokees.

I have this letter before me, but will not take the time to read it. But aside from this, there is positive proof that John W. West was a Western Cherokee, as set out in the report of the committee—House Report No. 820, this Congress—wherein the committee says upon this point:

As to the third objection, viz, that John W. West was an Eastern Cherokee, the record, among other things shows: The commission in its report states that the salt deposit was discovered by Bluford West in 1832, and traces the work done in the development of the property down to October 30, 1843, and then adds:

"All this time John W. West was living about 2 miles from the saline (Testimony, p. 101). * * * John did not work himself, but he worked his two negroes, Bill and Jake. Jake was the blacksmith (Testimony, pp. 102, 117, 131–132, 134; Exhibit F). Some time in the winter of 1841–42 Bluford West, John W. West, and David Vann came to the house of Joe Vann and entered into a contract of partnership for the purpose of operating the saline, each partner taking a third interest (Exhibit F). * * * Political troubles having arisen, the work upon the saline was discontinued, and the Wests were compelled, out of regard to their own safety, to abandon the nation (Testimony, pp. 156, 102; Exhibits I, F2). John W. West settled in Washington County, Ark. * * * Prior to this time [the winter of 1841–42] the saline had been Bluford West's individual property, but John W. West had labored with Bluford from the beginning in helping to develop it." (Testimony, pp. 19, 102, 131–132, 134; Exhibit F.)

This is positive testimony that John W. West was in the nation in 1832 and remained until 1844, when, because of the political troubles and out of regard to his own safety, he was compelled to abandon the nation. As the finding of the commission is clear that he was there in 1832, it follows, of necessity, that John W. West was a Western Cherokee. In addition to this proof we find in the report of the commission appointed in 1844 (S. Doc. 140, 28th Cong., 2d sess., pp. 41–43) positive proof that John W. West was a Western Cherokee. The following question was submitted by the commission to the Cherokee authorities:

"Question. State the relative number and description of official stations held by the 'old settlers' (Western Cherokees) for each year since June, 1840."

The answer contains a list only of the Western Cherokees who held office in the nation from 1839 to 1841, inclusive, in which list (p. 43) the name of John W. West appears. Opposite his name are the letters "T. P.," meaning "treaty party," which was composed of those Western Cherokees who favored the treaty of 1839 between the Eastern and Western Cherokees. In addition to this positive testimony there has been filed with the committee the following telegram, signed by a son of John W. West, deceased, which is corroborative of the official record:

PORUM, OKLA., May 28–29 m.

WEBSTER BALLINGER,
1415 G Street NW., Washington, D. C.:

I only know what my father told me. He came to the Cherokee Nation with his parents in 1830, then located near the salt well, and in the year 1834 went back to Tennessee after his family and returned in 1835.

JOHN C. WEST.

This proof your committee believes conclusively establishes that John W. West was a Western Cherokee. No evidence has been presented to your committee by the attorney for the Cherokee Nation in support of his statement that John W. West was an Eastern Cherokee, except the alleged fact that the names of certain of the children of John W. West were enrolled by judgment of the Court of Claims in 1910 as Eastern Cherokees. Upon this alleged evidence your committee is asked to set aside the finding of the commission in 1883, which finding was based upon positive evidence. This your committee declines to do. It is significant in this connection that D. W. C. Duncan, the Cherokee commissioner, who, it must be assumed, knew the facts with reference to John W. West, never challenged or questioned the fact that he was a Western Cherokee. But if he were, in fact, an Eastern Cherokee, your committee does not believe that fact would have deprived the commission of jurisdiction of his claim. John W. West acquired an interest in the property at the commencement of the work in 1832, and his interest was defined and recognized as a one-third interest in the contract with his brother, Bluford, which was signed by them in the winter of 1841–42 and before the confiscatory act of October 30, 1843. He did his part in the development of the property and paid partnership debts after dispossession. Neither he nor his heirs have ever received one cent for the property taken. The Cherokee commissioner, D. W. C. Duncan, representing the Cherokee Nation, heard and considered his claim and joined in the award. The Cherokee Nation is therefore, by all the rules of conscience, estopped from raising this question.

I want to say to you lawyers that I am bulwarked in the position I take by a unanimous decision rendered by a commission appointed under treaty of 1846, whereby a representative of the Cherokee Nation was appointed by the Cherokee authorities and a representative of the United States was appointed in accordance with that treaty to hear and finally determine this claim. You have the report before you and it is not necessary for me to read it. The seventh article of that treaty provides:

The value of all salines which were the private property of individuals of the Western Cherokees and of which they were dispossessed, provided there be any such, shall be ascertained by the United States agent and a commissioner, to be appointed by the Cherokee authorities; and should they be unable to agree they shall select an umpire, whose decision shall be final, and the several amounts found due shall be paid by the Cherokee Nation or the salines returned to their respective owners.

The Cherokee Nation refused, for years and years, to appoint its commissioner. Finally the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Teller, whom you all know, who served as long in the United States Senate, I think, as any other Senator, and who was a painstaking official, decided that the Cherokee Nation had been derelict in its duty in not appointing its commissioner, and demanded the immediate appointment by the nation of its commissioner.

Secretary Teller, in a letter to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs dated November 27, 1882, said:

The treaty provided specifically how the value of the claims for salines should be ascertained and settled.

This treaty provision, enacted into law, has not been complied with; its nonfulfillment is entirely due to the neglect of the Cherokee authorities to appoint a commission to act with the United States agent in fixing the value of the saline.

The Cherokee Nation should follow the treaty. * * * The United States and the Cherokee Nation are alike bound by the treaty, * * * and to see to its fulfillment for the benefit of those whose interests are specially involved in the provisions thereof. * * * The agent should be instructed to advise the proper authorities of the Cherokee Nation that he is ready to proceed under the provisions of the treaty to value the salines * * * and to request the nation to appoint a commissioner to act with him, as required by the treaty, in the matter.

Pursuant to these instructions the commission was appointed, D. W. C. Duncan being appointed by the Cherokee authorities, and John Q. Tufts, the United States Indian agent, acting for the United States.

The treaty required that if the two commissioners did not agree a third, an umpire, should be chosen to determine the difference, if there should be any. Conforming to the evidence, both of these commissioners agreed that John W. West was entitled to a one-third interest in this saline deposit, and a unanimous award was made in his favor for $5,000, and the commission suggested that as the claim was for property actually taken such reasonable rate of interest should be allowed as would be in accord with the dictates of equity and good conscience, the exact finding of the commission being in part as follows:

It is the opinion of this commission that John W. West, in his lifetime, and at the date of his death, was justly entitled to a one-third interest in the saline in question, and that by means of his death his heirs or legal representatives have rightfully succeeded to the same.

As to who these heirs are, see testimony, page 100.

If the valuation ($15,000) approved by this commission should be sustained, then there will be due the heirs of John W. West the sum of $5,000.

As to the matter of interest the commission would only suggest that the claim is for property that was actuall taken, and of the use of which the claimants and their testator have been unjustly deprived. It would seem that some moderate rate of interest would be in accord with the dictates of equity and good conscience.

A rehearing was asked before Secretary Teller, which was denied. In concluding his opinion, Secretary Teller says:

I therefore decline to reconsider the decision of the department of August 29, 1883, for the purpose of declaring that that part of the report of the commission relating to John W. West, or his heirs, is outside of the scope of their duties under the treaty. In the decision of August 29, 1883, your recommendations "that the heirs of John W. West should be left to pursue their remedy before the Cherokee authorities, if they see fit, without interference in their behalf by the department," was concurred in.

It now appears by papers filed by Allen Gilbert, as attorney and agent for the heirs of John W. West, deceased, that the claimants presented said claim to the Cherokee National Council held in November, 1883, praying for its allowance and payment; that the said council adopted a report adverse to the payment of the claim, made by a committee of that body; and that said council still refuses to pay the claim, or any part thereof. In view of these facts he claims that it is the right of the United States Government, as a party to the treaty, to insist on its fulfillment by the Cherokee Nation, and he therefore prays that such steps may be taken by this department as will secure the rights of the claimants. The treaty provided that if the United States agent and Cherokee Commission fail to agree, "they shall select an umpire, whose decision shall be final, and the several amounts found due shall be paid by the Cherokee Nation, or the salines returned to their respective owners."

The Cherokee Nation has not only failed but refuses to comply with the terms of the treaty. There are no funds to the credit of the Cherokee Nation out of which this department can order payment of the amount claimed by the heirs of John W. West, deceased, and as it is therefore not considered within the power of this department to enforce payment of the claim without special legislation by Congress therefor, the matter should be presented to the Congress for appropriate action.

In order to do this you will prepare and submit the necessary papers in proper form to be laid before Congress at the approaching session.

Succeeding Secretary Teller was Secretary Lamar, whom you all knew of, than whom there was never a more efficient Secretary of the Interior. No more painstaking lawyer ever served upon the Supreme Bench of the United States. He heard this case and also confirmed and approved the findings of this commission. Concluding his decision, Secretary Lamar says:

No new evidence has been presented since the decision of September 16, 1884. The hearing took place on 22d and 23d instant, and all the matters stated in argument by the attorneys and counsel have been carefully considered, and the conclusion reached is that no good and sufficient reason has been shown for disturbing the decision on the claim of August 29, 1883, reaffirmed by decision of September 16, 1884.

On the other hand, it is made more clearly to appear that the action already had on the case was right and just. Bills having been introduced in the present Congress (S. 2048, H. R. 7499) for the relief of the heirs of John W. West, deceased, and sent to the department by the Senate and House Committees on Indian affairs for reports, and this day referred to your office, you are hereby instructed to prepare and submit to this department the information called for to be forwarded to those committees.

Now, what else do you want? The only authority fixed by the treaty of 1846, the commission, unanimously found in favor of John W. West for $5,000. That decision was reviewed by Secretary Teller and reopened by Secretary Lamar, and the findings of the commission were in all respects reaffirmed by both Secretaries.

So I say if you will only get the cobwebs away from your eyes and look at this thing from a legal standpoint you will see that the opposition to this claim has not one leg to stand upon.

There is much testimony. All these people are dead. We had to go back many years to find what the testimony was in examining not only into the ownership but the value of this saline deposit. The commission in its finding says:

At this time—

Speaking of the time when this well was being operated—

John W. West was living about 3 miles from the saline.

The commission refers to the testimony, page 101, which is within the call of any Member of this House.

Bluford West was living on the saline premises.

The commission again refers to the testimony, giving the page.

At this time the work was carried on by the joint labor of the entire West family, John, Bluford, and Ezekiel. John did not work himself, but he worked his two negroes, Bill and Jake. Jake was the blacksmith.

And if you will observe the minority report, it refers to the fact that when this commission went there and made this examination they talked with the blacksmith, who said that they had been working upon this saline deposit for about three years.

Some time during the winter of 1841 Bluford West, John W. West, and David Vann came to the house of Joe Vann and entered into a contract of partnership for the purpose of operating the saline, each partner taking a third interest.

Now, gentlemen, bear in mind that this testimony is uncontradicted from any source whatever. If they went into a partnership, each partner having a third interest, John W. West had a third interest. It turned out afterwards that Vann purchased the kettles with which to carry on the work, but afterwards withdrew from the firm. That would seem as if it left John W. West and Bluford West one-half interest each, but that claim is not made here. We are still claiming that he only had a one-third interest. Yet the testimony is sufficient to lay the foundation for a claim that he was entitled to one-half instead of one-third.

It seems David Vann purchased the kettles with which to carry on the work, but he withdrew from the firm (Exhibit F); and political troubles having arisen, the work upon the saline was discontinued, and the Wests were compelled, out of regard to their own safety, to abandon the nation. (Testimony, pp. 102, 156; Exhibit I. F. 2.) John W. West settled in Washington County, Ark. Bluford West left his family on the saline place and went to Washington, D. C., on business, and there, in 1844 or perhaps in 1845, died. (Testimony, p. 12; Exhibit I. F.) Nancy West, widow, remained on the saline premises till 1850, and then voluntarily abandoned the place because of the decay of the improvements. (Testimony, p. 23.) In 1849 the witness B. W. Alberty and his brother, William Alberty, attempted to work the saline, but being admonished that it was national property they desisted.

I do not know what purpose the Assistant Secretary had in bringing Alberty into the case in the letter that was read by the chairman of the committee, because that does not pertain to this claim in any way whatever. That was the claim that they sought to make afterwards, after the claim had been abandoned by the Wests.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, he simply claimed to be an heir of John W. West, and our contention is that John W. West was an Eastern Cherokee and was not entitled to anything whatever.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I have not seen any record whatever that he claimed to be any heir of West. He did not enter upon these premises by reason of any heirship, but he went there for the purpose of inaugurating a new claim upon this saline. As to this question, whether he was a Western Cherokee or an Eastern Cherokee, the Secretary disposes of the matter, as any lawyer, in my judgment, would, by this statement:

The preamble of the treaty of 1846 sets out that "whereas serious difficulties have for a considerable time existed between the different portions of people constituting and recognized as the Cherokee Nation of Indians, which it is desirable should be speedily settled, so that peace and harmony may be restored among them."

No violence is done to the terms of the treaty by entertaining a claim of any Cherokee Indian to an interest in one of said salines, when such interest was acquired from a Western Cherokee. Such a claim is considered as fairly and reasonably provided for by the treaty.

I take it that any lawyer would say that a purchaser from a Western Cherokee, even though the purchaser were an Eastern Cherokee, would get the title that the Western Cherokee had, even though, as I say, he had been an Eastern Cherokee, which is a disputed fact, because it appears from all of this testimony that these people went there about the same time. John W. West went back to Tennessee, and was gone about a year. He went there to bring out his family, and by reason of his absence it might have been supposed that he was not a Western Cherokee. However that may be, as I say, it is a fundamental proposition of law that whoever has the title may dispose of it to whomsoever he will, and that title will become good, even though the treaty provided that the Western Cherokees should only be the beneficiaries; and so the Secretary of the Interior, Justice Lamar, used that language in discussing and disposing of the question whether this man was a Western or an Eastern Cherokee.

Here is the proposition: Here is a solemn treaty entered into between the United States and the Cherokee Nation, the provisions of which could not be deviated from. The carrying out of these provisions must accord with the treaty, and the treaty provided that the Cherokee Nation should appoint a commissioner and the United States should appoint a commissioner, and should they disagree there should be a third—an umpire—whose decision should be final. It never came to the umpire, because both of these commissioners not only agreed that John W. West had a one-third interest in this claim, but they agreed that it was worth $5,000. That was the only forum these parties could go to. It was the only settlement. The Government of the United States is a trustee for the purpose of carrying out the terms of this treaty. It has done all in its power to carry it out. It has demanded on two occasions that the Cherokee Nation should conform to the terms of the treaty and appoint its commissioner; and finally that was done; and finally these commissioners agreed upon it, and then it was taken to the Secretary of the Interior for review, and two Secretaries of the Interior, one in two decisions and another in one, confirmed the report of these commissioners. How are you going to get away from that proposition? Where is there any answer to it?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that the Cherokee Nation, through its council, paid to West's brother, Bluford West, $12,000 in full payment of this entire claim, for the whole West family, and did they not accept that; and is it not a fact that John W. West during his lifetime never did make this claim, but that his heirs did it since his death?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. No.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is the record.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. No; that is not the record. I want to say to the distinguished chairman of the committee, the claim that Mrs. Markham, the widow of Bluford West, made was for Bluford West's interests, and she made it as administratrix of the estate of Bluford West. Having made it as administratrix, John W. West's claim could not possibly have been brought before that tribunal as a claim, because she made it as administratrix, and here is the testimony that upon a solemn occasion a tripartite agreement was made between David Vann, Bluford West, and John W. West, dividing this saline into three parts, each taking a third, and there is not a particle of evidence in the record to the contrary. I agree that Mrs. Markham got $12,000 for her interest, but she got that with reference not only to her saline interest, but for the improvements upon this place, whereas John W. West had no improvements upon his claim. It was upon the claim of Bluford West. He had no claim, no personal property there. His sole interest was an interest in the saline, and it was a one-third interest, and that is all that he has ever been asking for. So I disagree entirely with the chairman that $12,000 was paid in full settlement of all the claims of Nancy Markham, sole heir and administratrix of the estate of Bluford West.

It was paid in full settlement of all the claims of Bluford West. It was paid to her as administratrix and not otherwise. Upon this point the commission found:

The ground taken by the claimant in this case is highly abstract and technical—the legal distinction between personal and representative character—between Nancy Markham and Nancy Markham, administratrix. It is not only technical, but in fact erroneous; for if Bluford West, testator, was dispossessed in 1843, the property taken vested at once in the estate, and at his death, in 1845, there was nothing to descend to Mrs. Markham, as heir, but an claim for damages, entire in law, indivisible. Hence her attempt to divide this one cause of action into two, from motives of policy, basing the distinction solely upon a modification of the claimant's name, has no foundation in reason or law, and should not, we think, be countenanced in a tribunal of justice.

But there is no one to explain these legal niceties to these non-professional members of the council. And when we reflect that many of them were full-blooded Indians, unable to speak or understand the English language (testimony, pp. 75, 55), without any means of knowing the nature of the business before the house except through the hasty translation by an interpreter, we can easily see how these men might be led to believe they were appropriating the $12,000 to pay the whole claim in full, notwithstanding there was before them an "itemized account" that left the saline out.

But the claimant has not always been inconsistent in this respect. She had previously been in the habit of proceeding in her own name for the whole claim, including both the "homestead" and the "saline." (Exhibit B, testimony, p. 128.) That the members of the council should presume that, in this instance also, she was proceeding in the same way (for both "homestead" and "saline") is perfectly natural and reasonable.

From the evidence before them, the commission is satisfied that at the time the $12,000 was appropriated it was the prevailing and candid impression in both the executive and legislative departments of the Cherokee government that it was in full payment of all demands whatsoever and that the claimant's attorneys were cognizant of the fact that it was so understood and ostensibly acquiesced in and encouraged that impression. To hold now that the settlement was anything less than final would be to encourage sharp inaction and effectuate a fraud upon the nation.

It is the opinion of the commission that the settlement was a compromise of all claims and that now there is nothing due to Mrs. Nancy Markham, administratrix, from the nation.

Notice that this related to the claim of Mrs. Markham only and has nothing to do with the claim of John W. West.

Immediately following the above is the finding in favor of the heirs of John W. West. The two claims were at all times treated and considered by the Cherokee Nation, the commission, and the department as separate and distinct claims.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that John W. West lived in that vicinity all of his life, that he died in 1868, and was aware that this woman was pursuing her claim both before the legislative body of the Indians and before these commissioners, and if he had any interest why did he not present the claim himself? Why wait until 1882?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. That statement is not correct. Upon this point the commission found:

In 1849 the present claimant, Mrs. Nancy Markham, herself filed a "memorial" before R. C. S. Broson, United States Indian agent, claiming this same property, in which she admits in the most solemn manner that her husband, Bluford West, in his lifetime had conveyed a one-third interest in the saline to John W. West. (Exhibit B.)

As a circumstance bearing upon this point, it seems that John W. West has been a coclaimant of this saline from the earliest times, along with his brother Bluford. In 1845 he went to Washington in the interest of his claim. (Exhibits I, Q, R.) John W. West assisted, through Joel M. Bryan, in getting the seventh article inserted in the treaty of 1846 in the interest of this claim. (Exhibit A; testimony, pp. 116, 117, 119, 160, 120.) John W. West but a few hours before he died spoke to his son, William M. West, about his interest in this saline. (Testimony, p. 103.) He paid partnership debts after the dispossession. (Testimony, p. 156.)

Again, the commission says:

After the close of the war Mrs. Nancy Markham renewed the prosecution of her claim, and on November 8, 1866, she presented her petition before the national council, claiming $10,000 for the saline property. (Testimony, p. 128.) This effort proved a failure, but in 1873 she again presented her claim; C. N. Vann, W. P. Adair, and Joel M. Bryan were her attorneys. (Testimony, pp. 59, 153, 155.) Adair was a Member of the Senate. (Testimony, p. 67.) S. H. Benge was helping Mrs. Markham. (Testimony, p. 16.) At the same time the heirs of John W. West were present looking after their interest in the same saline property. (Testimony, pp. 16, 105.) They were represented by Joab Scales and Perry Brewer. At this time Mrs. Markham obtained an appropriation of $12,000. (Exhibit X.) The heirs of John W. West failed to get anything, and as yet have received nothing. (Testimony, p. 104, answer to interrogatory 22.)

So that it is clear that John W. West during his life prosecuted his claim with diligence; that during his life Mrs. Markham recognized his interest, and that after his death his heirs did all they could to secure payment. This should eliminate in the mind of every lawyer that there was either laches or negligence on the part of the claimant. Mrs. Markham's claim was confounded with an interest in the saline as well as the improvements upon the claim. The treaty of 1846 had nothing to do with the improvements. That had reference to the settlement for the saline, and when Mrs. Markham went before the council and presented her claim she confounded the two interests and asserted a claim for both. One was for an interest in the saline and the other was for personal property. That is how it came.

I want to say that it is true that John W. West died in 1868, but he was exiled from the Territory for a number of years before that, and not only that—and I desire to call this particularly to the attention of my brother lawyers—but the only possible forum, that provided for in the treaty, whereby he or any other owner of a saline claim could go, was this tribunal, made up of a commissioner of the Cherokee Nation and a commissioner of the United States, and that tribunal was never appointed until 1883. I will say to the gentleman he should know that the heirs of John W. West did put in their claim to the Cherokee council. Why did the council refuse to recognize the claim? Because it was not the forum provided for in the treaty.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does the gentleman desire an answer to that question?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It was because John W. West was an Eastern Cherokee and was not entitled to anything whatever under that treaty, and that is the main ground of defense here.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad now to run the chairman down to the last hole.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And the gentleman will admit this also, that these Eastern Cherokees, he and his heirs, have received funds as Eastern Cherokees and are cut off entirely from anything as Western Cherokees, and that will be found among the records here. Mr. Miller is the man who distributed the Eastern Cherokee funds, and he states that the heirs of John W. West were Eastern Cherokees and had received funds from him in that way. Hence he could not have been a Western Cherokee.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Now, Mr. Speaker, the chairman of as big a committee as the Committee on Indian Affairs will not undertake, I know, to deceive this House, but it is by way of deception. There is no relationship whatever between the distribution of the judgment of the Court of Claims and this claim. There is absolutely no relationship whatever between the two. The gentleman speaks about a letter wherein it says that a "John" West and his children were enrolled in 1851 as Eastern Cherokees. That roll does not contain the name of "John W." West. Now, I have a letter of date of July 22 from the clerk of the Court of Claims, in which he says:

I beg to advise you that the roll of old settlers, of Western Cherokees, made in 1851 and filed in the Court of Claims January 10, 1910, contains, among others, the following names of old settlers from the western district.

Then follows Laura West, Ruth West, John West, Robert West, Jane West, Tallaquah district, Cherokee Nation, group 37. Now, those are the children of John W. West, so in 1851 they were counted as Western Cherokees, and I do not deny what the chairman has said, that Guyon Miller says that they were upon the other roll, but they were upon both rolls, and therefore that does not account for anything but——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman think if they had been on both rolls and received pay both ways they ought to be satisfied.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Why, I have said to the gentleman that the drawing of pay in the one way or the other has nothing whatever to do with this claim. The two are not associated together. Now, does the gentleman for one moment say that because they drew their allotment or drew the stipend from the one or the other that that has any effect whatever upon this claim? Answer that question.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If they drew their stipend as Eastern Cherokees, then they ought not to be permitted to go along and claim that because they were Western Cherokees they were entitled to this saline. There is such a thing as an estoppel among the Indians as well as white men.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Then I understand the gentleman does not put it upon the ground that because they drew the money by reason of their descent on their mother's side from Eastern Cherokees, but upon the distinction of their being Eastern or Western Cherokees?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If they are Eastern Cherokees, they are not entitled to anything in these salt works.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I have produced here a letter that is of equal credence to the letter the gentleman produced where they are put down as Western Cherokees or old settlers. Now, one is an offset to the other. But aside from that there is positive proof contained in the report of the committee that John W. West was a Western Cherokee, and there is no evidence, either circumstantial or positive, to be produced to the contrary. All that, however, reminds me to refer again, and I want every lawyer in this House to bear that in mind, that it does not make a particle of difference whether they were Eastern or Western Cherokees, yet if we believe the uncontradicted testimony here in that respect it is satisfactorily shown that they are Western Cherokees.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have been interested in the gentleman's argument. It seems to me that there is another proposition, and I do not know whether the gentleman has discussed it or not, and that is the question of estoppel in regard to whether John W. West or his estate or his heirs are entitled to the sum which the gentleman claims. I understand that $12,000 was paid to the heirs of his brother, Bluford West, in full settlement for improvements on these works. Now, I understand also that the heirs of Bluford West began the prosecution of their claim in 1843, that it was not settled until 1873, that John W. West was living in 1868; that he, and his heirs at his death, sat by and saw this sum paid to the heirs of Bluford West and this claim was not put in and no mention was made of any claim until 1882 or 1883. Now, it seems to me that, taking that state of facts, the question of estoppel would arise as to whether they can come in and ask to collect again for the same thing.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I see the confusion in my friend's mind. I have stated that Bluford West's widow made a claim for the improvements in the saline which she made to the Cherokee council and she got $12,000 and which she got as administratrix of her husband, but that has nothing to do with this claim. Now, I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the record here. This claim was asserted by John W. West when the property was taken. He came to Washington in 1845–6 and assisted in securing the inclusion of article 7 in the treaty of 1846, for the creation of a commission to adjudicate the claim. In 1849 Mrs. Markham acknowledged the interest of John W. West in the property by a memorial duly recorded in the office of the United States Indian agent for this tribe. The claim was presented to the Cherokee council for payment and no action taken on it because, at least in part, the treaty had provided another tribunal in which it was to be determined. The members of that tribunal were not appointed until 1882, because of the refusal of the nation until that time to appoint its commissioner, at which time John W. West was dead; but the claim was presented by his heirs to that tribunal in seasonable time, by it considered, and an award regularly made, all of which appears in the findings of the commission.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does the record show that the claim made by the administratrix of Bluford West was a claim which he owned entire by himself or was he only claiming a part of the property?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Not only that, but if the gentleman will permit, she states she never heard of John West when she prosecuted her case before the Cherokee council. You will find that in the evidence.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. The distinguished chairman of the Indian Committee will certainly not stop with that statement.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is there anyway.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. The gentleman knows she made an affidavit in 1849, and while John W. West was alive, in which she stated that John W. West had a third interest in this claim. After his death she contradicted that affidavit, but she did make an affidavit that John W. West entered in a contract with her husband, Bluford West, and acquired a one-third interest in this claim.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, if the gentleman will pardon me, the point I want to get at is this, whether or not the Cherokee Nation, in making a settlement for the improvements to this property, and so forth, settled with the idea that the $12,000 paid for all the improvements and the entire work, in other words everything that was to be paid for, or whether they paid it with the idea that it was only for a two-thirds interest in the property.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Well now, the gentleman is a lawyer, and he must take the documentary evidence and determine what it amounts to.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I was asking the gentleman for information; I know nothing myself.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I say the record shows she settled as administratrix of her husband for $12,000 and then came in afterwards and put in another claim for so much more. The nation could not have considered the $12,000 paid her as a payment in full for the property, for at the time the payment was made to Mrs. Farkham the claim of the heirs of John W. West was pending before the Cherokee council, and no action was taken on it. The settlement was for her interest alone as sole heir and administratrix of the estate of Bluford West, and the commission so found, and had no connection whatever with the claim of John W. West.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I do not remember. I very often introduce bills by request. I do not remember of having introduced either one of these bills.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I find you did not introduce this bill by request in 1909, which is a copy of my bill, and there has not been anything changed in the record. The record was there then, as it is now, and I do not believe the gentleman from Texas is in the habit of introducing bills simply to build up a record of the number of bills that he introduces in the House. I believe that he must have examined into the merits of this claim when he introduced this bill in 1909.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The bill came up for discussion in 1911, last year, which was the first time that I ever went into it, and I was satisfied there was nothing in it then.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Now, I want to say, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, that I am bulwarked by the opinion of two of the ablest Secretaries of the Interior that ever occupied that office, one of them having served upon the Supreme Bench of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Somebody told me that I had five minutes more.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, my understanding of the time was that we were to conclude at five minutes after 1 p. m The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] used about five minutes, and I do not see how the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] could have consumed 45 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] has one minute more. The Chair was going by the wrong clock.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have a letter from the Secretary of which the distinguished chairman did not read the whole. I would like to just put in a few of the things that he did not read. It says:

RELIEF OF HEIRS OF JOHN W. WEST.

Amendment No. 91, page 35, beginning with line 7, authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to pay $5,000 to the administrator of the estate of John W. West, together with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from September 16, 1884, in full payment of the award made by the commission appointed pursuant to the authority contained in the seventh article of the treaty with the Cherokees, promulgated August 17, 1846, and which award was approved by the Secretary of the Interior September 16, 1884, and since reaffirmed. This claim has been pending before the department, this office, and Congress for a great many years. It has been carefully investigated and reconsidered a number of times. D. W. C. Duncan, commissioner on the part of the Cherokee Nation, and J. Q. Tufts, United States Indian agent, appointed pursuant to the seventh article of the treaty of 1846, reported in favor of the claim of the heirs of John W. West in the sum of $5,000, together with a "moderate rate of interest" thereon.

The department during the last 25 years has made a number of reports on the claim in question. The department, in its report dated December 26, 1911, said that "in view of the history of this claim, the action heretofore had thereon, and the long delay in the prosecution thereof," it would not be justified in recommending the passage of H. R. 6544. The award made by Messrs. Duncan and Tufts, representatives of the Cherokee Nation and the Government, were reconsidered by both Secretaries Teller and Lamar, and in their letters, dated September 16, 1884, and April 26, 1886, respectively, they both declined to take action to disturb the decisions theretofore rendered in favor of the claim. It appears that the House Committee on Indian Affairs, in Report No. 820, Sixty-second Congress, second session, under date of June 1, 1912, recommended that the claim of the heirs of John W. West be paid. A minority report was filed by seven members of the House committee, signed by Chairman Stephens and others, found in Report No. 820, part 2, Sixty-second Congress, second session, recommending against the payment of the claim. The Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, in report dated May 7, 1912, No. 706, Sixty-second Congress, second session, recommended unanimously in favor of the claim, and adopted the majority report of the House Committee on Indian Affairs. The House and Senate reports herein referred to contain a complete history of the claim of the heirs of John W. West, and attention is invited to these reports, with the view of such action being taken on Senate amendment No. 91 as the conferees and the Congress may deem just and proper in the premises.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I would like three minutes more.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman three minutes more out of our time.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. As I have said, I was sustained by two Secretaries of the Interior, and I have been sustained by three reports made by the Senate, the last one being an exact copy of the report that is now upon your desks. And in addition to that I want to say that there is only one time when this claim has been disapproved, and that was in the Sixty-first Congress. I am sorry that my friend from Oklahoma [Mr. MCGUIRE] is not here. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENDALL] ought to bear some testimony upon that. The gentleman from New York, Mr. Young, whom we all know as a distinguished ex-Member, was a member of the subcommittee having charge of the bill, and I would like to call upon any one member of that subcommittee that ever saw that report that was presented by the distinguished gentleman from Brooklyn. He did not prepare the report, and its authorship has at all times been kept a profound secret. Yet it has been repeatedly stated on the floor of this House that that report received careful consideration at the hands of the committee. Some one prepared it and gave it to its alleged author, and in the absence from the city of the other members of the subcommittee it was presented to the full committee and acted upon without any member of the committee knowing the facts. This is the careful consideration of this matter to which repeated reference is made by those who signed the minority report.

Objection is made to this provision on the ground that it is a private claim on an appropriation bill. When understood, this objection is not sound. This claim arises out of a treaty stipulation and was adjudicated by a tribunal specially created by article 7 of the treaty of 1846, and the treaty provided that the award should be final and should be paid by the Cherokee Nation. This bill to which it has been added as an amendment is "A bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes." As the payment of this award is a fulfillment of a treaty stipulation the amendment was a proper amendment to this bill and would not be subject to a point of order under the rules of this House.

The United States was a party to this treaty. It guaranteed fulfillment of the treaty provisions. The commission was appointed pursuant to the terms of the treaty. The award was regularly made. By the terms of the treaty it was a finality. The Government of the United States can not now shirk its responsibility, particularly as two Secretaries of the Interior—the officer of this Government whose duty it is to supervise such matters, and men whose legal ability and fairness all men must concede—examined into the award with care and approved it in all respects. If such an award had been made in favor of a citizen of this country against a foreign government we would have sent our Navy, if necessary, to have enforced payment. Because the award is against an Indian nation or tribe is no reason why the Government of the United States should shirk its responsibility and place itself in the position of repudiating its solemn treaty agreements. The Government of the United States is in honor bound to see that this award is paid.

There has been no negligence on the part of the claimants in prosecuting their claim. They are not in fault. The sole and only reason this claim has not been paid heretofore is that for the past 30 years the Cherokee Nation has had its attorney on an annual salary and expenses here, who has lobbied before Congress and prevented the enactment of legislation providing for the payment of this award. These claimants were unable to maintain an attorney here to prosecute their claim, and in common fairness they should not have been expected to have done so. When the award was made the duty devolved entirely upon the Government of the United States to see to it that it was paid, and it would have been paid long ago had it not been for the presence in this city, session after session of Congress, of the attorney for the Cherokee Nation.

The interest provided for is less than half the amount recommended by the commission. It dates only from the date the award was approved by the Secretary of the Interior and is at the same rate the Government has allowed the Cherokee Nation for its funds on deposit in the Treasury of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I suggest, inasmuch as the time is about half of what has been yielded by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER], the gentleman from Illinois consume his time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, in the consideration of appropriation bills, which originate in the House, the House is severely handicapped by the procedure which now prevails. We pass an appropriation bill after consideration in Committee of the Whole, where every item is scanned and may be discussed and amended. We send that bill to the Senate, where every item in the House bill is subject to inspection, discussion, and amendment by the Senate. Thereupon the Senate adds such amendments as it chooses, sends them over to the House, where, without any consideration at all, they are usually sent to conference, and generally, without receiving much consideration in conference, owing to the lack of time, some agreed to and some disagreed to—some meritorious ones agreed to, some meritorious ones disagreed to, some without merit disagreed to, and some without merit agreed to—in the form of a compromise. And it seems to have become the habit in the distinguished body at the other end of the Capitol to add a great many amendments to House appropriation bills which are subject to criticism. Gentlemen who have claims or other propositions without much merit and who fear the discussion in the daylight which appears in the House upon the consideration of bills go over to the Senate and urge that amendments may be inserted with the understanding that they can not become a law unless agreed to in conference.

And through that method of persuasion a great many amendments are agreed to in the Senate which would not be agreed to there if they were considered as final, and would not be agreed to in the House if they were ever considered in the House.

The Indian appropriation bill seems to be the pet place for the Senate to add amendments. We have read in recent months some statements which were reported to emanate from distinguished gentlemen in the other legislative body about how the House was adding legislative provisions to appropriation bills, and yet this Indian appropriation bill now before us is filled with legislative provisions and with claims, none of which ought to be in order under the rules either of the House or of the Senate and which have no proper place in an appropriation bill at all.

In the very limited time which I have, I can not discuss all of the Senate amendments, and can only make a number of references to a few of them. Amendment 33 provides for an appropriation of water for the irrigation of approximately 150,000 acres of land and the maintenance of a public plant, and so forth, in connection with irrigation purposes on the Colorado River. If such a project is to be entered into, it ought to be considered by the House. There were some propositions of the sort before the House, and the House, with the knowledge it had before it, did not incorporate them. That proposition has no proper place in this bill without consideration by the House, which it can not obtain.

Here is another amendment, providing for the purchase of a sawmill and logging equipment——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What is the number of that amendment?

Mr. MANN. No. 57. It is a scheme which ought not to be entered upon without knowledge on the part of the House that it is engaging in that kind of a business enterprise.

I shall not take time to discuss the amendment which has been discussed by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER], the John W. West claim amendment, which is a pure claim, in my judgment, without any merit whatever of its own, and I have examined all of the papers in connection with the matter which I have been able to obtain, and they are quite numerous. But the claim, whether meritorious or not meritorious, has no proper place in an Indian appropriation bill. A bill providing for this claim is on the Private Calendar, where it may be considered. It has no place in an appropriation bill.

Here is an amendment, numbered 105, providing for the construction of a sanitary sewer system for a little park down at Platt, Okla., $35,000. I do not know; we may be starting in to install sanitary sewer systems in all of the parks and forests of the country. What earthly use is there for a sanitary sewer system, or any other kind of a sewer system, in this little park to be constructed by the General Government?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman tell us what that has to do with Indian affairs—the sewer system that he speaks of?

Mr. MANN. Well, it is down in the old Indian country.

Mr. SIMS. It used to be in the old Indian country.

Mr. BUTLER. Perhaps it is because it is in a place where the Indians used to live.

Mr. MANN. I recall that a year or two ago an item of this kind was offered on the sundry civil appropriation bill, and the gentleman from Oklahoma, most concerned in it, voluntarily allowed it to go out. Now we have it here as an item in the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I suppose it is inserted here because it happened to cross an old Indian trail.

Mr. MANN. No; the gentleman is mistaken. The reason why they inserted it here is because they think they have more influence on the conferees.

Here are two items, Nos. 111 and 112. One provides for the payment of $41,000 to the Indian, Okemah, trustee of the Kickapoo community in Mexico, and the purpose of the amendment is purely and simply to permit the payment of the $41,000 to an attorney for claimed attorney's fees.

Mr. CARTER. What number is that?

Mr. MANN. That is No. 111. Here is No. 112, which provides for the deposit in the First National Bank of Douglas, Ariz., of all moneys known as lease money now on deposit with or in any manner under the control of the agents and officers of the Interior Department for various Indians, and the receipt by such bank for any such money shall operate as the receipt of the Indian owner and as a complete release of all liability on the part of the officer paying leased money as herein directed; no insinuation, even, that the bank shall turn it over to the Indians, and the purpose is to pay it to the bank in order that the bank may pay it to an attorney. No intention that a cent of it shall ever get into the hands of any Indian; to take the receipt of the bank as the receipt of the Indian and then propose to turn it over to somebody else. The amendment in its form is scandalous and its intent is fraudulent. [Applause.]

I have not the time to discuss No. 137, proposing a scheme of $1,800,000 in reference to reclamation and irrigation work in the Yakima Indian Reservation, but if such a plan is to be entered upon it ought to be entered upon after consideration by the House and not merely by a Senate amendment agreed to as a trade in conference. There are a whole lot of other amendments relating to the same proposition which I do not have time to discuss.

I shall not take the time to go over again the proposition that was discussed here the other day on the deficiency bill, to pay a judgment of $3,305,257.19, which reeks with scandal from the beginning to the point that it now has reached. Probably the scandal has not ceased there.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What is the number of that?

Mr. MANN. Oh, that is the Ute matter. I do not want the gentleman to think that the only amendments that I object to are those that I am speaking about, because I do not have the time to take them all in.

There is another amendment here, No. 117, providing for the payment of a lot of money to various Indians of the Tillamook Tribe, in Oregon, and various other Indian tribes, and, if they are dead, to their heirs.

And the meat in the coconut is this provision of the amendment, that the Secretary of the Interior shall find and investigate what attorney or attorneys, if any, have rendered services for or on behalf of said Indians, and shall fix a reasonable compensation to be paid to said attorney or attorneys for their services in prosecuting the claims of said Indians.

Every old attorney in town who, through some open or secret connection, is able to get some inside or public information concerning some old Indian claim or treaty, thereupon proceeds to render services, or claims to render services. Then he wants to be paid. I received from a gentleman in town this morning a letter in reference to a statement I made the other day that in the Ute Indian matter the main services rendered by the attorneys were lobbying in Congress. This gentleman denied that. I do not know from personal knowledge whether that statement was correct or not, but the Court of Claims, in allowing the compensation, stated that the man's principal services had been lobbying in Congress.

I am opposed, now and at all times, to the payment of these exorbitant, scandalous claims of attorneys for lobbying with committees or with Members of Congress. I think it ought to be stopped and not encouraged. I hope that if this bill goes to conference the House conferees will have the judgment and the nerve to say, "We will not agree to these amendments which have been placed upon this appropriation bill." [Applause.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] such time as he desires.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. How much time has the gentleman from Texas remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. He has 22 minutes left.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will ask that I be notified when I have spoken for seven minutes.

I would like to follow up the last statement made by the gentleman from Illinois, in which he said that he hoped that the House conferees would see that certain amendments to this bill are eliminated in conference, by stating that the House will have an opportunity in 22 minutes to express itself on one proposition that is in the bill—that is, a private claim—because a motion will be made to concur in the amendment of the Senate providing for its payment.

I am not going to discuss the merits of this claim, which is the John W. West claim, which was so earnestly and ably discussed by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER]. I simply want to call the attention of the House to the fact that it is a private claim; that it dates back to the year 1843 or 1845; that it was carefully considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs in the last Congress, and a unanimous report made against it; that it was considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs in the present session of Congress and a favorable report made thereon, with seven members of the committee, including the chairman, filing minority views.

The bill is upon the Private Calendar of the House. I presume it will be considered during this Congress. There will then be an opportunity to discuss the merits of the measure. The proposition for us to consider at this time is whether or not the House will concur in such an amendment on an appropriation bill, it being a private claim.

Mr. Speaker, there is much in what the gentleman from Illinois has said relative to provisions that have been incorporated in the Indian appropriation bill—that were put in after the bill left the House and agreed to in conference. We have one instance where an attorney's fee was paid which amounted to $750,000. The authority for collecting such a fee was incorporated in an Indian appropriation bill in another legislative body and agreed to in conference.

We discussed on Saturday last the matter of paying a judgment in favor of the Ute Indians, wherein it appeared that an attorney's fee had been paid aggregating, in round numbers, $211,000. Before the judgment was entered the Indians had $1,250,000 and were receiving annually $50,000, being 4 per cent interest on that amount. At the present time the Indians have nothing but a judgment, and that the House refused to appropriate for, but the attorneys have received $211,000. The Indians have lost their income. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says it reeks of fraud and scandal, and I agree with the gentleman; but I want to say in reference to that matter and others that he may have had in his mind when he made that statement, that the House is responsible, because the House has consented to agree to conference reports containing provisions that made such scandal possible.

I say we have an opportunity at the present moment to disagree to an amendment of the Senate that proposes to pay one of these old, stale, outlawed claims that does not belong on the Indian appropriation bill, and therefore it is not necessary for me to discuss the merits of that measure. Let the conferees go from the House with all of the amendments disagreed to, of which there are 156, and let the conferees determine whether or not they will concur in this or any other amendment. I do not think the House need have any fears about what the attitude of the conferees on the part of the House will be, so far as this amendment is concerned, upon which the gentleman from Colorado will make a motion to concur. I hope his motion will be voted down; that the House will disagree to all of the amendments of the Senate and ask for a conference.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] five minutes.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I do not think I shall consume more than about one minute. I just want to make this reference to the claim of John W. West. I do not care to go into the merits of this claim any further than to repeat what has been so well said by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE], to wit, that there is already a bill on the calendar providing for the payment of this claim.

There was some dissension about reporting the bill favorably from the Committee on Indian Affairs. The chairman of the committee, together with the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE], my colleague [Mr. FERRIS], the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], and myself signed a minority report opposing the payment of the claim. In due time it will come before the House and be considered in the proper way, and I do not think it should be passed on an appropriation bill, for it is purely a claim. We have not now sufficient time to go into a detailed discussion of this amendment, and I think the matter should come up in the regular way, when a full discussion of the merits can be had.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, just a word in reference to the claim of John W. West, without any time to enter into a thorough discussion of the merits of the case. I wish to call the attention of the membership of the House to one most significant feature of this claim.

It was 69 years ago when this mudhole that they call a salt lick was taken by the Cherokee Nation from Bluford West and Mr. Rogers. Bluford West died 67 years ago. His widow, Nancy West, subsequently married a man named Markham, and as Nancy Markham, in 1873, after repeated efforts with the Cherokee Nation Council, secured $12,000 for this lick and the improvements thereon. It then came into the mind of some one that a brother of Bluford West, John W. West, had a one-third interest in the claim. There was no writing that showed that he had any interest in this real estate. No pen ever marked a word which said he ever had a right or title to any part of it, and his lips now for almost half a century have been sealed with death. During a period of 25 years, however, that he lived those lips never murmured a word that he had a claim in this salt lick spring. Talk about a claim with whiskers, Mr. Speaker; it has not only whiskers, but the whiskers are gray. It has literally been dug up from the earth, hoary headed and phantom formed. While there is much that can be said in an argument such as the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] has said, with good discretion and earnestness, yet unless we are to grasp at a will-o'-the-wisp, unless we are to take tradition and superstition as a basis for a claim, demanding something substantial, something consistent before we pay out other people's money, then this must be rejected.

Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Indian Affairs in the last Congress gave this a most thorough and careful investigation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, after that careful and thorough investigation the committee unanimously agreed that for two reasons the claim should not be paid: First, because it had not been established with any degree of certainty that would justify either the committee in reporting in its favor or this House voting to adopt such a report from the committee; and, second, such a long period of time has elapsed and the claimants were guilty of such laches in any view of the case that they could not be granted relief, could not come to this or to any tribunal hoping to get equity. Not having evidence to establish a legal claim, they can not appeal to equity, because they have not observed one of the fundamental principles of equity. So, Mr. Speaker, in view of these considerations, in addition to the fact that it is a personal claim, in addition to the fact that the House ought to have a right to consider it as a bill by itself, in addition to the fact that it has no place on an appropriation bill, I think the motion ought to be voted down.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remaining time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 10 minutes. The Chair would state that he made a mistake as to the length of time in stating that the debate would run out at 1 o'clock. It will close at 5 minutes past 1.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to occupy the 10 minutes with reference to this claim, because, as a matter of fact, I do not know the facts in reference to the claim itself, but I do know this: That there is a bill pending before this Congress now for this claim, and if it has merits it can be taken up in the regular way and be considered at a proper time. The bill now pending before the House is a general appropriation bill. I think there has always been in this House a great abuse of the rules of the House in putting legislation upon appropriation bills. There may be an excuse for it sometimes—a justification for it sometimes—when there are matters of great public moment that require immediate attention, and when the only way they can be brought immediately to the attention of both Houses of Congress is to put them upon appropriation bills. But that, in my judgment, can only be justified when they are matters of great public moment, where the constituencies of all men in the House are interested There is no justification whatsoever for putting on an appropriation bill and thus delaying its passage a private claim, even though that claim be a very just claim and a very meritorious one. In the first place, there is not an opportunity in considering a claim of that kind on an appropriation bill to go into the real merits of the claim. Public business should not be delayed in passing appropriation bills by the discussion of private claims.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks the House ought to concur in an amendment of the Senate which would not be germane to the bill if it had been offered when the bill was pending in the House?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not; and I certainly do not think so if it is a private claim. If it were some matter of great public moment and the Senate were determined on its suggestion and the House had to yield, it might be different; but I do not think that this House ought to make a precedent of putting any private claim on a general appropriation bill, and for that reason I hope that the House will vote down this claim and reject the Senate amendment, regardless of whether the claim is just or not. It ought not to be considered on this bill, and it ought not to be considered at this time.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I now move to disagree to all of the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves to disagree to all of the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, as an amendment, I move that the House concur in amendment No. 91.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Texas that he ask unanimous consent to disagree to all of the Senate amendments except the one stated by the gentleman from Colorado, No. 91, and also amendments Nos. 33, 117, 130, and 137, upon which amendments I desire a separate vote.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Very well, Mr. Speaker, I will make that request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to disagree to all of the Senate amendments, excepting the one designated by the gentleman from Colorado, numbered 91, and also amendments 33, 117, 130, and 137. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado moves to concur in amendment No. 91.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BURKE of South Dakota) there were—ayes 2, noes 61.

So the motion to concur was rejected.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that amendment No. 33 be disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to disagree to amendment No. 33.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 74, noes 0.

So the motion to disagree was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move to disagree to amendment No. 117.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 63, noes 0.

So the motion to disagree was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I now move to disagree to amendments numbered 130 and 137.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to disagree to amendments numbered 130 and 137.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 72, noes 0.

So the motion to disagree was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House ask for a conference.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry, and preliminary to that allow me to state that upon the Committee on Indian Affairs the seniority membership contains gentlemen who are opposed to the bill that I am in favor of. This is especially true of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] who is a member of that committee and second, I think, in seniority, and who ought not to be upon the committee on conference. He is a Cherokee Indian himself, and I do not believe that he ought to be allowed to sit on that committee.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me for just a moment——

The SPEAKER. Of course all of this is by unanimous consent.

Mr. CARTER. I think I can satisfy the minds of the House very quickly upon that point. I have three-eighths Cherokee blood, but I have no more interest in the estate of the Cherokee Nation than the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER]. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Blood is thicker than water.

Mr. CARTER. I have an interest in the estate of the Chickasaw Tribe of Indians, and even if this matter concerned the Chickasaw Indians' funds I doubt if the gentleman's objection would be good; but I have no interest whatever in the Cherokee funds.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman's three-eighths Indian blood have more interest than the five-eighths of white blood would have on the other side, in any event?

So the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees:

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, Mr. CARTER, and Mr. BURKE of South Dakota.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. AYRES was granted leave of absence for two days, on account of illness in his family.

AMERICAN REFUGEES FROM MEXICO.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from the further consideration of Senate joint resolution 127. This is a resolution which came over from the Senate yesterday afternoon and was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, where it has been amended and restricted in its operation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from the further consideration of the resolution named and to take it up for consideration.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to say this: I understand this is an emergency resolution which requires immediate action, and if it is not going to delay the House at this time I have no objection to unanimous consent. If it brings on general debate——

Mr. SLAYDEN. I assure the gentleman it is not the purpose of the proponents of the measure to have any debate. The House, I think, perfectly understands what the resolution is.

The SPEAKER. Of course, the Chair recognized the gentleman to make the motion with the understanding it is a matter of necessity or emergency. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what the proposition is.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, the resolution authorizes the expenditure, under the general direction of the Secretary of War, of so much of $20,000——

Mr. MANN. Can not we have it reported?

Mr. SLAYDEN. There is a report which explains the whole matter, going into it very fully, if the Clerk will read it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to cause to be supplied, through the proper military officers at El Paso, Tex., all necessary tents, together with temporary rations, for the care and relief of American citizens who have been compelled to remove and are yet removing from threatened danger in the Republic of Mexico and who are seeking refuge in El Paso, Tex., and adjacent portions of the United States.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am authorized by the committee to offer the following amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "authorize," in line 3 of the resolution, insert the following: "To expend not to exceed the sum of $20,000, out of any unexpended balance of the money appropriated for the Mississippi flood sufferers, May 9, 1912."

In line 5 strike out the word "all"; in line 7, after the word "who," insert the following: "have no other means of obtaining shelter and food."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was read the third time and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to joint resolution (S. J. Res. 127) authorizing the Secretary of War to supply tents and rations to American citizens compelled to leave Mexico.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to bill (H. R. 20728) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GAMBLE, Mr. CLAPP, and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

WOOL AND MANUFACTURES OF WOOL.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 22195, a bill revising the rates on the woolen schedule, and pending that I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 22195, to consider the Senate amendment, and pending that asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

An act (H. R. 22195) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool.

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the 1st day of January, 1913, the articles hereinafter enumerated, described, and provided for shall, when imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), be subjected to the duties hereinafter provided, and no others; that is to say:

1. On wool of the sheep, hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals, and on all wools and hair on the skin of such animals, the duty shall be 20 per cent ad valorem.

2. On all noils, top waste, card waste, slubbing waste, roving waste, ring waste, yarn waste, bur waste, thread waste, garnetted waste, shoddies, mungo, flocks, wool extract, carbonized wool, carbonized noils, and on all other wastes and on rags composed wholly or in part of wool, and not specially provided for in this act, the duty shall be 20 per cent ad valorem.

3. On combed wool or tops and roving or roping, made wholly or in part of wool or camel's hair, and on other wool and hair which have been advanced in any manner or by any process of manufacture beyond the washed or scoured condition, not specially provided for in this act, the duty shall be 25 per cent ad valorem.

4. On yarns made wholly or in part of wool, the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem.

5. On cloths, knit fabrics, felts not woven, and all manufactures of every description made, by any process, wholly or in part of wool, not specially provided for in this act, the duty shall be 40 per cent ad valorem.

6. On blankets and flannels, composed wholly or in part of wool, the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem: Provided, That on flannels composed wholly or in part of wool, valued at above 50 cents per pound, the duty shall be 45 per cent ad valorem.

7. On women's and children's dress goods, coat linings, Italian cloths, bunting, and goods of similar description and character, composed wholly or in part of wool, and not specially provided for in this act, the duty shall be 45 per cent ad valorem.

8. On clothing, ready-made, and articles of wearing apparel of every description, including shawls whether knitted or woven, and knitted articles of every description made up or manufactured wholly or in part, and not specially provided for in this act, composed wholly or in part of wool, the duty shall be 45 per cent ad valorem.

9. On webbings, gorings, suspenders, braces, bandings, beltings, bindings, braids, galloons, edgings, insertings, flouncings, fringes, gimps, cords, cords and tassels, ribbons, ornaments, laces, trimmings, and articles made wholly or in part of lace, embroideries and all articles embroidered by hand or machinery, head nets, nettings, buttons or barrel buttons or buttons of other forms for tassels or ornaments, and manufactures of wool ornamented with beads or spangles of whatever material composed, on any of the foregoing made of wool or of which wool is a component material, whether containing india rubber or not, the duty shall be 35 per cent ad valorem.

10. On Aubusson, Axminster, moquette, and chenille carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description, the duty shall be 40 per cent ad valorem.

11. On Saxony, Wilton, and Tournay velvet carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description, the duty shall be 35 per cent ad valorem.

12. On Brussels carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description, the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem.

13. On velvet and tapestry velvet carpets, figured or plain, printed on the warp or otherwise, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description, the duty shall be 35 per cent ad valorem.

14. On tapestry Brussels carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description, printed on the warp or otherwise, the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem.

15. On treble ingrain, three ply, and all chain Venetian carpets, the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem.

16. On wool Dutch and two-ply ingrain carpets the duty shall be 25 per cent ad valorem.

17. On carpets of every description, woven whole for rooms, and Oriental, Berlin, Aubusson, Axminster, and similar rugs, the duty shall be 50 per cent ad valorem.

18. On druggets and bockings, printed, colored, or otherwise, the duty shall be 25 per cent ad valorem.

19. On carpets and carpeting of wool, flax, or cotton, or composed in part of any of them, not specially provided for in this act, and on mats, matting, and rugs of cotton, the duty shall be 25 per cent ad valorem.

20. Mats, rugs for floors, screens, covers, hassocks, bed sides, art squares, and other portions of carpets or carpeting, made wholly or in part of wool, and not specially provided for in this act, shall be subject to the rate of duty herein imposed on carpets or carpeting of like character or description.

21. Whenever in this act the word "wool" is used in connection with a manufactured article of which it is a component material, it shall be held to include wool or hair of the sheep, camel, goat, alpaca, or other like animals, whether manufactured by the woolen, worsted, felt, or any other process.

SEC. 2. That on and after the day when this act shall go into effect all goods, wares, and merchandise previously imported, and hereinbefore enumerated, described, and provided for, for which no entry has been made, and all such goods, wares, and merchandise previously entered without payment of duty and under bond for warehousing, transportation, or any other purpose, for which no permit of delivery to the importer or his agent has been issued, shall be subjected to the duties imposed by this act and no other duty upon the entry or the withdrawal thereof.

SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed. This act shall take effect and be in force on and after the 1st day of January, 1913.

The Senate amendment was read as follows:

An act (H. R. 22195) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved August 5, 1909, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," is hereby amended by striking out all of Schedule K thereof, being paragraphs 360 to 395, inclusive, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

SCHEDULE K. WOOL AND MANUFACTURES THEREOF.

360. All wool, hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals, shall be divided, for the purposes of this act, into the two following classes:

361. Class 1, that is to say, merino, mestiza, metz, or metis wools, or other wools of merino blood, immediate or remote, Down clothing wools, and wools of like character with any of the preceding, including Bagdad wool, China lamb's wool, Castel Branco, Adrianople skin wool, or butcher's wool, and such as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Buenos Aires, New Zealand, Australia, Cape of Good Hope, Russia, Great Britain, Canada, Egypt, Morocco, and elsewhere, Leicester, Cotswold, Lincolnshire, Down combing wools, Canada long wools, or other like combing wools of English blood and usually known by the terms herein used, and all wools not hereinafter included in class 2.

362. Class 2, that is to say, Donskoi, native South American, Cordova, Valparaiso, native Smyrna, and all such wools of like character as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Turkey, Greece, Syria, and elsewhere, excepting improved wools hereinafter provided for; the hair of the camel, Angora goat, alpaca, and other like animals.

363. The standard samples of all wools which are now or may be hereafter deposited in the principal customhouses of the United States, under the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be the standards for the classification of wools under this act, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to renew these standards and to make such additions to them from time to time as may be required, and he shall cause to be deposited like standards in other customhouses of the United States when they shall be needed.

364. Whenever wools of class 2 shall have been improved by the admixture of merino or English blood, from their present character as represented by the standard samples now or hereafter to be deposited in the principal customhouses of the United States, such improved wools shall be classified for duty as class 1.

365. The duty on wool of the first class shall be 35 per cent ad valorem.

366. The duty upon wools of class 2 shall be 10 per cent ad valorem.

367. The duty on wools on the skin shall be as follows: Class 1, 30 per cent ad valorem; class 2, 10 per cent ad valorem; the quantity and value of the wool to be ascertained under such rules as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

368. Top waste, slubbing waste, roving waste, ring waste, and garnetted waste, 30 per cent ad valorem.

369. Shoddy, noils, wool extract, yarn waste, thread waste, and all other wastes composed wholly of wool or of which wool is the component material of chief value, and not specially provided for in this section, 25 per cent ad valorem.

370. Woolen rags, mungo, and flocks, 25 per cent ad valorem.

371. Combed wool or tops, and all wools which have been advanced in any manner or by any process of manufacture beyond the washed or scoured condition, not specially provided for in this section, 40 per cent ad valorem.

372. On yarns made wholly of wool or of which wool is the component material of chief value, the duty shall be 45 per cent ad valorem.

373. On cloths, knit fabrics, blankets, and flannels for underwear, composed wholly of wool or of which wool is the component material of chief value, women's and children's dress goods, coat linings, Italian cloths, bunting, clothing ready made, and articles of wearing apparel of every description, including shawls, whether knitted or woven, and knitted articles of every description made up or manufactured wholly or in part, felts not woven, and not specially provided for in this section, webbings, gorings, suspenders, braces, bandings, beltings, bindings, braids, galloons, edgings, insertings, flouncings, fringes, gimps, cords and tassels, ribbons, ornaments, laces, trimmings, and articles made wholly or in part of lace, embroideries and all articles embroidered by hand or machinery, head nets, nettings, buttons or barrel buttons or buttons of other forms for tassels or ornaments, and manufactures of wool ornamented with beads or spangles of whatever material composed, any of the foregoing made of wool or of which wool is the component material of chief value, whether containing india rubber or not, 55 per cent ad valorem.

374. Aubusson, Axminster, moquette, and chenille carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description; Saxony, Wilton, and Tournay velvet carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description; Brussels carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpetings of like character or description; velvet and tapestry velvet carpets, figured or plain, printed on the warp or otherwise, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description; tapestry Brussels carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description, printed on the warp or otherwise; treble ingrain, three-ply, and all chain Venetian carpets; wool Dutch and two-ply ingrain carpets; carpets of every description, woven whole for rooms; oriental, Berlin, Aubusson, Axminster, and similar rugs, druggets and bockings, printed, colored, or otherwise; all the foregoing, made of wool, or of which wool is the component material of chief value, 35 per cent ad valorem.

375. Carpets and carpeting of wool or of which wool is the component material of chief value, not specially provided for in this section, 35 per cent ad valorem.

376. Mats, rugs for floors, screens, covers, hassocks, bedsides, art squares, and other portions of carpets or carpeting made wholly of wool or of which wool is the component material of chief value, and not specially provided for in this section, shall be subjected to the rate of duty herein imposed on carpets or carpetings of like character or description.

377. Whenever, in any schedule of this act, the word "wool" is used in connection with a manufactured article of which it is a component material, it shall be held to include wool or hair of the sheep, camel, goat, alpaca, or other animal, whether manufactured by a woolen, worsted, felt, or any other process.

378. All manufactures of hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, or other like animal, or of which any of the hair mentioned in paragraph 363 form the component material of chief value, shall be subject to a duty of 30 per cent ad valorem.

SEC. 2. That on and after the day when this act shall go into effect all goods, wares, and merchandise previously imported, and hereinbefore enumerated, described, and provided for, for which no entry has been made, and all such goods, wares, and merchandise previously entered without payment of duty and under bond for warehousing, transportation, or any other purpose, for which no permit of delivery to the importer or his agent has been issued, shall be subjected to the duties imposed by this act and no other duty, upon the entry or the withdrawal thereof.

SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed. This act shall take effect and be in force on and after the 1st day of January, 1913.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suppose the five minutes on a side will be satisfactory to the gentleman.

Mr. PAYNE. I think we had better have a little more time than that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman wants to reach an agreement about time I am willing to make an agreement, or if he wants a little further extension under the five-minute rule I am willing to agree to it.

Mr. PAYNE. How much time does the gentleman propose to take altogether?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not care to make a general speech, and under the rule speeches are limited to five minutes, but I do not care to hold the gentleman down to that. I would like to dispose of the question, as we have three propositions that we wish to send back to the Senate.

Mr. PAYNE. Suppose we let it run a little while under the five-minute rule. I will not want to talk over 10 minutes, but I want to suggest that perhaps I had better make my motion now, as I wish to make a motion to concur with an amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just one moment, the gentleman's motion has precedence. Mr. Speaker, there is but one Senate amendment to the bill, and I move to disagree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves to disagree to the Senate amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move to concur, with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out all of the paragraphs of Schedule K of section 1 of said act, from 360 to 395, inclusive of both, and inserting in place thereof the following:

1. All wools, hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals shall be divided, for the purpose of fixing the duties to be charged thereon, into the two following classes:

2. Class 1, that is to say, merino, mestiza, metz or metis wools, or other wools of merino blood, immediate or remote, Down clothing wools, and wools of like character with any of the preceding, including Bagdad wool, China lamb's wool, Castel Branco, Adrianople skin wool or butcher's wool, and such as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Buenos Aires, New Zealand, Australia, Cape of Good Hope, Russia, Great Britain, Canada, Egypt, Morocco, and elsewhere, and Leicester, Cotswold, Lincolnshire, Down combing wools, Canada long wools or other like combing wools of English blood, and usually known by the terms herein used, and all wools not hereinafter included in class 2, and also the hair of the camel, Angora goat, alpaca, and other like animals.

3. Class 2, that is to say, Donskoi, native South American, Cordova, Valparaiso, native Smyrna, Russian camel's hair, and all such wools of like character as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Turkey, Greece, Syria, and elsewhere, excepting improved wools hereinafter provided for.

4. The standard samples of all wools, which are now or may be hereafter deposited in the principal customhouses of the United States, under the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be the standards for the classification of wools under this act, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to renew these standards and to make such additions to them from time to time as may be required, and he shall cause to be deposited like standards in other customhouses of the United States when they may be needed.

5. Whenever wools of class 2 shall have been improved by the admixture of merino or English blood, from their present character, as represented by the standard samples now or hereafter to be deposited in the principal customhouses of the United States, such improved wools shall be classified for duty as class 1.

6. If any bale or package of wool or hair specified in this act, invoiced or entered as of class 2, or claimed by the importer to be dutiable as of class 2, shall contain any wool or hair subject to the rate of duty of class 1, the whole bale or package shall be subject to the rate of duty chargeable on wool of class 1; and if any bale or package be claimed by the importer to be shoddy, mungo, flocks, wool, hair, or other material of any class specified in this act, and such bale contain any admixture of any one or more of said materials, or of any other material, the whole bale or package shall be subject to duty at the highest rate imposed upon any article in said bale or package.

7. The duty on all wools and hair of class 1, if imported in the grease, shall be laid upon the basis of its clean content. The clean content shall be determined by scouring tests which shall be made according to regulations which the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. The duty on all wools and hair of class 1 imported in the grease shall be 18 cents per pound on the clean content, as defined above. If imported scoured, the duty shall be 19 cents per pound.

8. The duty on all wools of class 2, including camel's hair of class two, imported in their natural condition, shall be 7 cents per pound. If scoured, 19 cents per pound: Provided, That on consumption of wools of class 2, including camel's hair, in the manufacture of carpets, druggets and bockings, printed, colored, or otherwise, mats, rugs for floors, screens, covers, hassocks, bedsides, art squares, and portions of carpets or carpeting hereafter manufactured or produced in the United States in whole or in part from wools of class 2, including camel's hair, upon which duties have been paid, there shall be allowed to the manufacturer or producer of such articles a drawback equal in amount to the duties paid less 1 per cent of such duties on the amount of the wools of class 2, including camel's hair of class 2, contained therein; such drawback shall be paid under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

9. The duty on wools on the skin shall be 2 cents less per pound than is imposed upon the clean content as provided for wools of class 1, and 1 cent less per pound than is imposed upon wools of class 2 imported in their natural condition, the quantity to be ascertained under such rules as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

10. Top waste and slubbing waste, 18 cents per pound.

11. Roving waste and ring waste, 14 cents per pound.

12. Noils, carbonized, 14 cents per pound.

13. Noils, not carbonized, 11 cents per pound.

14. Garnetted waste, 11 cents per pound.

15. Thread waste, yarn waste, and wool wastes not specified, 9½ cents per pound.

16. Shoddy, mungo, and wool extract, 8 cents per pound.

17. Woolen rags and flocks, 2 cents per pound.

18. Combed wool or tops, made wholly or in part of wool, or camel's hair, 20 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 5 per cent ad valorem.

19. Wool and hair which have been advanced in any manner or by any process of manufacture beyond the washed or scoured condition, but less advanced than yarn, not specially provided for in this section, 20 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 8 per cent ad valorem.

20. On yarns, made wholly or in part of wool, valued at not more than 30 cents per pound, the duty shall be 21½ cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 10 per cent ad valorem.

Valued at more than 30 cents and not more than 50 cents per pound, 21½ cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 15 per cent ad valorem.

Valued at more than 50 cents and not more than 80 cents per pound, 21½ cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 20 per cent ad valorem.

Valued at more than 80 cents per pound, 21½ cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 25 per cent ad valorem.

21. On cloths, knit fabrics, flannels, felts, and all fabrics of every description made wholly or in part of wool, not specially provided for in this section, valued at not more than 40 cents per pound, the duty shall be 25 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 30 per cent ad valorem.

Valued at more than 40 cents and not more than 60 cents per pound, 26 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 35 per cent ad valorem.

Valued at more than 60 cents and not more than 80 cents per pound, 26 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 40 per cent ad valorem.

Valued at more than 80 cents and not more than $1 per pound, 26 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 45 per cent ad valorem.

Valued at more than $1 and not more than $1.50 per pound, 26 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 50 per cent ad valorem.

Valued at more than $1.50 per pound, 26 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 55 per cent ad valorem.

22. On blankets and flannels for underwear composed wholly or in part of wool, valued at not more than 40 cents per pound, the duty shall be 23½ cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 20 per cent ad valorem.

Valued at more than 40 cents and not more than 50 cents per pound, 23½ cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 25 per cent ad valorem.

Valued at more than 50 cents per pound, 23½ cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 30 per cent ad valorem.

Provided, That on blankets over 3 yards in length the same duties shall be paid as on cloths.

23. On ready-made clothing and articles of wearing apparel, knitted or woven, of every description, made up or manufactured wholly or in part and composed wholly or in part of wool, the rate of duty shall be as follows:

If valued at not more than 40 cents per pound, the duty shall be 25 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 35 per cent ad valorem.

If valued at more than 40 cents and not more than 60 cents per pound, 26 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 40 per cent ad valorem.

If valued at more than 60 cents and not more than 80 cents per pound, 26 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 45 per cent ad valorem.

If valued at more than 80 cents and not more than $1 per pound, 26 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 50 per cent ad valorem.

If valued at more than $1 and not more than $1.50 per pound, 26 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 55 per cent ad valorem.

If valued at more than $1.50 per pound, 26 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 60 per cent ad valorem.

24. On all manufactures of every description made wholly or in part of wool, not specially provided for in this section, the duty shall be 26 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 50 per cent ad valorem: Provided, That if the component material of chief value in such manufactures is wood, paper, rubber, or any of the baser metals, the duty shall be 26 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 35 per cent ad valorem, and if the component material of chief value in such manufactures is silk, fur, precious or semiprecious stones, or gold, silver, or platinum, the duty shall be 26 cents per pound on the wool contained therein, and in addition thereto 55 per cent ad valorem.

25. On hand-made Aubusson, Axminster, Oriental, and similar carpets and rugs, made wholly or in part of wool, the rate of duty shall be 50 per cent ad valorem: on all other carpets of every description, druggets and bockings, printed, colored, or otherwise, mats, rugs for floors, screens, covers, hassocks, bedsides, art squares, and portions of carpets or carpeting, made wholly or in part of wool, the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem.

26. Whenever, in any schedule of this act, the word "wool" is used in connection with a manufactured article of which it is a component material, it shall be held to include wool or hair of the sheep, camel, goat, alpaca or other animal, whether manufactured by the woolen, worsted, felt, or any other process.

27. The foregoing paragraphs, providing the rates of duty herein for manufactures of wool, shall take effect on the 1st day of January, 1913.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to concur by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting an amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. I will state I do not care to have this read unless some gentleman desires it. It is the same amendment I offered to the original bill in the House when the bill was before the House on a previous occasion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was read in the House and the House understands it.

Mr. PAYNE. It was read in the House and offered by the minority of the committee and voted for by the minority membership of the House, but of course if any gentleman desires to have it read——

Mr. MONDELL. I would be glad if the gentleman would ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of it.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of this amendment.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Is it not necessary, before we proceed further, that the Senate amendment be read or disposed of?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I suppose the vote will come on the Senate amendment, and I ask unanimous consent, as the bill is printed and before the House, to dispense with the reading of both the Senate amendment and the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if the bills will appear in the RECORD if they are not read?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The question is, When will a motion to agree to the Senate amendment be in order? The gentleman from New York has moved to agree to the Senate amendment with an amendment. I understand that would have priority over a straight motion to agree to the Senate amendment. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moves a disagreement, and I understand that a motion to concur or agree to the Senate amendment would have priority over the motion of the gentleman from Alabama. I want to know whether I am right or not.

The SPEAKER. I think the gentleman is entirely correct.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. So that the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] would be first in order, and, if his motion should be voted down, then a motion to agree to the Senate amendment would be in order?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I want to make that motion at the proper time.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] that the negative of the motion to disagree carries concurrence. If I recollect the rule rightly, there is only one motion in order, except the motion to concur with an amendment. That is the motion to disagree or the motion to concur, but the negativing of the motion to disagree carries concurrence. That is my recollection.

The SPEAKER. There is not any doubt but that is a correct statement of the rule.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The motion to concur with an amendment is divisible, is it not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so. The Chair will state his understanding of the situation. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] can make his motion to concur or let it alone, as he chooses. He can make it now or after the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is voted down. Of course, if the gentleman from New York is voted up, that ends the matter. The Chair is taking it for granted that the motion will be voted down.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that the Speaker should not express an opinion on anything of that kind. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair was not expressing an opinion. The Chair was trying to get the parliamentary situation simplified. The proposition laid down by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] is correct, that if the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to disagree is voted down, that is equivalent to a concurrence, and there is no necessity of putting the motion to concur. If the gentleman from Indiana, however, makes a motion to concur, although it would be superfluous, the Chair does not see how it can do any harm. But if all three of these motions are pending at once, then the order in which they would come would be, first, on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]; second, on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER]; and then on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama to disagree.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Then, I desire to move that the House agree to the Senate amendment to the pending bill.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman offers his motion and the House votes it down, that carries with it the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is recognized.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will not detain the House at this time in discussing this proposition. The wool bill has been fully discussed not only at this session of Congress, but at the last session of Congress. The Senate amendment is the amendment that was adopted by the Senate at the last session of Congress, known as the La Follette bill, which the House disagreed to at the last session of Congress and finally sent to conference, out of which grew a compromise bill. I think the Members of the House are fully advised as to the difference between the Senate amendment and the House bill, and without there is some occasion later on in the debate I will not take up the time of the House in discussing the two bills at the present time. I understand the debate is under the five-minute rule.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, this original wool bill, brought in by the Committee on Ways and Means, came here first with the only excuse for its existence that we needed a revenue duty of about 20 per cent on wool in order to rescue and save a depleted and depleting Treasury.

The next month showed that the depleted Treasury had a surplus of over $47,000,000 to its credit for the year 1911, derived from the present revenue laws. A year has passed since then, and the report of the 30th of June showed a surplus in the Treasury for that year of over $37,000,000 receipts over the expenditures. A month has nearly passed in the present fiscal year, and the Treasury reports show that the Treasury is nearly $14,000,000 better off for this month up to date than it was after a month a year ago. So there can be no excuse for any gentleman who is talking free trade in wool to his constituents to vote for this present House bill in any way or shape. That argument is entirely removed from the controversy by the light of the Treasury statistics and the splendid showing of the present revenue law in relation to raising revenue.

We have as a Senate amendment the same one that came here about a year ago. Of course, every Member of the House knows the authorship of that amendment. At the time the bill was in conference a year ago the author of the amendment confessed that he was working with blacksmith tools, so to speak, or, in other words, that he had not sufficient information with which to form a tariff bill. However, a compromise bill was agreed upon without the information and went to the Executive, who sent it back with his veto, and the bill and the veto are now in the House files without any action. This bill was introduced, as I say, nearly a year afterwards, passed the House, and went over to the Senate, and comes back with the same Senate amendment. The President vetoed the bill because the Tariff Board was gathering information and would soon be ready to report. They have reported. They have made a full report. They have made a report that has met the commendation of experts on the tariff question the world over—not confined to this country alone, but praised in other countries as the most thorough and complete investigation and report ever made anywhere in any country in the world on the wool question, and better than all the information previously gathered upon this subject. When that report came in I was in hopes that my friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] would study it, but he seems to have delegated that matter to some other gentlemen, who made a report which misled him, I am sorry to say, or he never would have indorsed it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to interrupt my friend from New York [Mr. PAYNE] on that proposition. Every time he comes into this House he makes that statement. The gentleman from New York knows that his statement is untrue. "The gentleman from Alabama" did study this report and did study the bill. The gentleman from New York knows that that is so. It is not important, however, because I think the gentleman makes the statement in a facetious way, but I do not want it to remain in the RECORD uncontradicted.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman who, I said, made the investigation and report has confessed it. I do not need to prove it. That is the evidence that I offer in regard to it. Where a man confesses to such a thing as that—not quite a crime, but much like a misdemeanor—why, I think that the evidence binds even the gentleman from Alabama. Of course, I have no objection to his offering a general denial, but I hope he will not insist that that report was his report, because I shall be led, very much to my sorrow, to think the contrary.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that he is stating what is untrue when he tries to imply to this House that either I or my committee did not report that bill. We hired experts. I know what the gentleman wants to say. He wants to say that we hired Mr. Parsons and that we hired Prof. Willis and that we hired other employees to aid us doing the mechanical work. We did, but all their work was submitted to the committee, and the committee went over the reports. I went over the reports, and we were responsible for them, and they were our reports just as much as the reports that the gentleman from New York made on his bill were his reports, although he did not write them himself.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I must still be permitted—because I am careful of the honor and credit of my friend from Alabama and of his intellectual ability, and so forth—to say that I think he is mistaken in this matter and that the man who confesses to have done this thing is really the guilty party.

Let me add, Mr. Speaker, that the minority of the committee did study that tariff report and did study the facts presented by the Tariff Board; and, after much deliberation and, I will say to the gentleman from Alabama, with the aid of experts who figured under the direction of the gentlemen who were engaged in preparing that bill, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], particularly, spending much time in verifying their figures from day to day, we prepared a bill which we presented to this House and which we present again.

I would like to see it become a law. I think if it should be in operation for a couple of years even the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] would not try to disturb it, but would allow it to remain upon the statute book. "It would not injure our business," to repeat the favorite expression of the gentleman from Alabama. It would not destroy any industry. It would allow the wheels of progress to go on, and at the same time it would take away every excessive duty in the present wool schedule. It is an ideal bill in that respect. It ought to receive the vote of every Member on both sides of the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one word more. I have a telegram here from a constituent. He is a manufacturer of woolen goods. He is not a bloated aristocrat. He is not a malefactor of great wealth. He is a common, everyday American citizen, who understands his business and who was educated in it and knows what hard work is. He says:

> The La Follette bill will close or seriously injure every woolen mill in your district.

It is signed "A. M. Patterson." I commend that to the attention of gentlemen upon this side and upon the other side of the House.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have spoken at some length upon the woolen schedule in times past, and I do not now propose to inflict myself further upon the House. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] needs a little time, and I think also the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]. I do not know what other gentlemen want to use time, but I commend them to the mercies of the House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to concur with an amendment, and for the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] to concur, and I shall do that for two reasons, the first being that the Senate bill now before the House is sustained by the report of the Tariff Board, and, when fully analyzed, is not very different from the bill reported by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] for the Committee on Ways and Means.

The gentleman from New York has briefly discussed this Senate bill, and has stated that in conference the author of that bill said that it was prepared with blacksmith's tools. Mr. Speaker, when one examines the report of the Tariff Board and examines this wool bill, prepared before that report was made, and finds how nearly they agree, he is compelled to conclude that that author of the bill did a mighty good job with his blacksmith's tools. [Applause.] And one is led further to wish, Mr. Speaker, that when the Committee on Ways and Means of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate prepared the Payne-Aldrich bill they might have had some blacksmith's tools of this character. [Applause on the Democratic side.] One is compelled further to wonder, Mr. Speaker, what kind of tools they did have in the work that they did there.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I further am opposed to sending this bill to conference and I am opposed to sending it back to the Senate, because if you gentlemen of the Democratic majority want real revision, and want to send a bill to the President with the assurance that he must sign it, because it is in accordance with the Tariff Board, you ought to vote to concur in this amendment now. This country is demanding some action in the way of tariff revision, and is insisting that neither side play politics with reference to this great question. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of disagreeing to the Senate amendment. A year ago, under instructions from my committee, I was one of the conferees who voted for the compromise bill with the Senate, but during the year that has passed the conditions have materially changed. During this interval the three great political parties have made their nominations for the Presidency, and it seems perfectly clear to us, and I believe it is clear to you gentlemen on the other side, that on the 4th of March next a Democratic President will be inaugurated. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, if I am right in that forecast, I am in favor of waiting until we get a Democratic administration and can pass Democratic tariff bills. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am in favor of passing the Underwood bill, and am not in favor of passing the La Follette bill. The La Follette bill has been under discussion both in the Senate and in the House many times, and it is unnecessary for me now to detain this House with a more lengthy discussion of its features.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. LENROOT. Can not the gentleman afford some relief to the people by passing this bill now, and then, if his prediction is true, pass a Democratic bill later?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. If we pass a revision of the woolen schedule now, the business community of the country will be entitled to some relief from further agitation on that specific schedule, and rather than imperil a genuine Democratic revision of the woolen schedule, I am willing to postpone for six months the possibility of securing the relief that the people demand.

Mr. LENROOT. One more question.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman think the business interests will not be agitated in the meantime?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I think that one revision of one tariff schedule in six months is enough, and I am in favor of waiting those six months to get some genuine relief. This Democratic Congress was sent here by the consumers of the country and not by the producers. Your Tariff Board report, to which you make reference, is a producers' report. It deals exclusively with the difference in the cost of production, if any, here and abroad. It is written in the interest of the woolen producers and the woolen manufacturers, and it has no bearing upon a genuine revision of the tariff in the interest of the consuming public. The best proof that I can give in support of my assertion is that the Republican Party themselves, in their recent platform, have entirely abandoned their previous declarations in favor of fixing tariff rates by a difference in cost of production here and abroad. In the present platform they do not say a word about that. They have dropped it entirely, and with it they ought to drop the pretense of fixing tariff rates upon the report of their Tariff Board, because that report of the Tariff Board deals practically exclusively with trying to find out an assumed difference in cost of production here and abroad in the production of wool and in the manufacture of woolen articles.

The Democratic Party were able to drive the Republican Party from their platform position of awarding a reasonable profit to American manufacturers in addition to this assumed difference in cost of production. Now we have been able to drive the Republican Party entirely from their whole platform position, and they did not have the temerity in the platform recently adopted at Chicago to insist upon measuring tariff rates by the difference in cost of production here and abroad. It was found upon an analysis and examination of the Tariff Board's report on wool and woolens that it was impossible to discover the cost of production in this country, let alone the difference in cost of production here and abroad; and for anyone to pretend that that report of the Tariff Board furnishes any basis whatever for the fixing of rates for a woolen schedule is to fly in the face of facts.

I am in favor of passing a Democratic revision of the woolen schedule. I am not in favor of compromising for a frankly protective measure, and I hope this House will flatly refuse to agree to the Senate amendment. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, there are three measures pending before the House at this time. I ask unanimous consent that I may have 5 minutes on each one; that is 15 minutes altogether.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to the gentleman having 15 minutes, but I should like to see if I can get an agreement with the gentleman from New York about the length of time to be occupied before a vote is taken.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know of anyone who wants to speak on this side except the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How much time will they consume?

Mr. HILL. I should like 15 minutes—5 minutes on each bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. On the Hill bill, the La Follette bill, and the Underwood bill.

The SPEAKER. Five minutes on each of the three wool bills.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; 15 minutes. But when the debate is closed, we will vote on them all at one time.

Mr. HILL. Yes; I understand. We have got to make our choice between these three, and I think we ought to consider them all at one time.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire?

Mr. MCCALL. Five minutes.

The SPEAKER. And how much time does the gentleman from Indiana desire?

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Indiana wishes five minutes.

The SPEAKER. That will be 25 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman wants 25 minutes on that side?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask that all debate on this bill be closed in 50 minutes, 25 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from New York and the other 25 to be controlled by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that debate on this bill be closed in 50 minutes, 25 minutes of that time to be controlled by himself and 25 by the gentleman from New York, it being understood that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] is to have 15 out of the 25.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I assume that the gentleman from New York is going to yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, the three bills pending are, first, the Underwood bill, originally introduced from the Ways and Means Committee, giving 20 per cent duty on wool and 40 per cent duty on cloth, these being the principal items in the bill; second, the Senate amendment prepared and presented by Senator LA FOLLETTE, giving 35 per cent duty on wool and 55 per cent duty on cloth; and third, the Republican House bill, supported I believe by every Republican on this side of the Chamber, giving the rates called for in accordance with the report of the Tariff Board.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] gives it as his opinion that it is impossible to ascertain the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, and that therefore, the report of the Tariff Board is of no value. If the gentleman is right, then he stands facing the opposite opinion of the whole world, because most of the business in this world has for its basis the fixing of the selling price upon the cost of the product that is sold.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The gentleman must concede that the selling price has very little to do with the cost of production.

Mr. HILL. I do not concede it. The selling price must be in accord with cost, or production ultimately stops in any line of business.

What are the characteristics of the Republican bill which was presented by this House and voted for by every Republican? First, that all unnecessary and ineffective duties in the wool schedule as shown clearly and explicitly by the Tariff Board should be eliminated, and they were eliminated. Second, that cotton should not bear a wool duty, coming in in woolen fabrics or woolen manufactures. That great fault in the wool schedule is inherent, both in the Underwood bill and in the La Follette bill, which my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] says he proposes to vote for in preference to the House bill. The Underwood bill absolutely puts a pair of rubber boots—to use the old, familiar illustration—under the wool duty. The La Follette bill does not do that particular thing, but errs in other respects. The Republican bill puts them where they belong, in the rubber schedule or under the clothing paragraph limiting the wool duty to the wool contained therein and nothing more. The compensatory duty is based exactly upon the report of the Tariff Board.

Another thing. The Republican bill puts carpet wool on the free list, and carpet wool constitutes 60 per cent of our raw-wool importations. That is a Republican proposition. It is a noncompetitive product, which ought not to bear any duty. The La Follette bill makes it dutiable at 10 per cent. The Democratic bill makes it dutiable at 20 per cent, and adds to the cost of the American product, an increase in the cost of every carpet put into every home in the United States.

So much for the distinctive characteristics of that particular bill. It is protective in every item, and yet it is lower than the Democratic bill presented here by the Ways and Means Committee, so far as the whole schedule is concerned, not in particular items. I am perfectly free to admit that you can pick out items from the Republican bill which are higher than the Democratic bill; but the schedule as a whole is lower under the Republican bill, the bill which the Republicans voted for, by several per cent—at least 6 or 8 per cent—than the bill presented by the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee.

Now, in regard to the La Follette bill. What is it? I have said that the La Follette bill puts a wool duty on cotton. It does. It differs from the Democratic bill in this respect, that under the La Follette bill the article of chief value must be wool, but any article containing 51 per cent in value of wool and 49 per cent of cotton would come into this country with the cotton bearing the same duty as the wool. No such restriction is found in the Democratic measure. If there is one single woolen yarn in a piece of cloth and all the rest is cotton or jute, under your Democratic measure it bears the full wool duty. That is not in accordance with the report of the Tariff Board.

Now, then, as to the rates. The gentleman from Wisconsin says that he proposes to vote for the La Follette bill and vote down the motion for the bill which he voted for before. Does he deem the La Follette bill a better measure? Let me show him. Thirty-five per cent on wool, 55 per cent on cloth, means 34 per cent on woolen cloth on the basis of free wool. The Wilson bill, with free wool, gave 40 per cent on cloth worth less than 50 cents a pound, and every one of you gentlemen know that the cloth that is made worth less than 50 cents a pound is exceedingly rare, because the scoured wool alone is worth on the average 45 cents. The Wilson bill gave 50 per cent on cloth worth more than 50 cents a pound, and that was all of it practically, and this La Follette bill gives 34 per cent net on woolen fabrics, 16 per cent less than the Wilson bill of 1894. The Underwood bill gives 28 per cent, where the La Follette bill gives 34 per cent, where the Wilson bill gave 50 per cent. Take that home to yourselves and judge what the result will be. We are facing a campaign. I want to ask the Republicans on this side if they are going before their constituents and say that they voted here for a proposition that cut the duty on woolen fabrics 16 per cent below that which they had been condemning for the last 18 years? Are you? I say to Republicans and Democrats alike there is no halfway house in this country. Under both party declarations now there is no halfway house between English free trade and protection. [Applause on the Republican side.] We will have either protection based on the difference in the unit cost of production, fair alike to the consumer and the producer, or we will have English free trade. There is no mistake about that. It is such protection absolutely on farm products, on citrus fruits, on lead and zinc, on iron and steel, on every schedule in the tariff, measured by the difference in the unit cost of production, or it is English free trade on them all, and the people of the United States have got to take their choice in this campaign. Talk to me, the hypocritical talk that you can, about a tariff rate below the difference in the unit cost of production and not hurt an industry! Take this very schedule and talk about not injuring the industry! Ninety-six per cent of the entire consumption in this line of industry is home production now. Only 4 per cent is imported, and yet the Democratic bill, made according to the report of the Democratic committee, absolutely provided for the additional importation of 200,000,000 pounds of foreign wool, either in its raw state or in the fabric. Can that be done without hurting the domestic industry? It provided for an additional importation of $40,000,000 worth of foreign cloth. It transferred the labor of 25,000 men from this country to Europe. Can it be done without injuring the American industry? Oh, I say to you, gentlemen, that it is time to think. Read your own platform, and read our platform. You can not go below the difference in the unit cost of production without encouraging foreign importations. When you encourage foreign importations you drive out the domestic product. That is your modern idea of a tariff for revenue only.

My Democratic friends, if you want a definition of a tariff for revenue only, go back to the South Carolina nullification convention of 1832, that all protected articles must go on the free list, all customs duties laid must be laid on noncompetitive products. That is a tariff for revenue only, and your platform has compelled your candidate to stand upon it, with the declaration that you have no power to lay or collect duties on any other basis. The Republican platform is to-day, and it has been for four years, for protection measured by the difference in the unit cost of production at home and abroad, but with an amendment now that if any duties are higher than that they shall be reduced, after an investigation—careful, protracted, and thorough—by an independent, nonpartisan tariff board. Such investigation has been made in the bill presented here by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], cheerfully, enthusiastically, and patriotically offered by him as an amendment to the present law which bears his name. Is there any Republican on this side of the House who will go back upon his former vote in favor of that proposition and advocate for any reason whatever the bill presented by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] in the Senate, 15 per cent below the Wilson bill? If he does, I wish him joy in answering some of the questions which his constituents, I fear, will ask him during the coming campaign, for, as I have said, there is no halfway house where the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States can stand and collect duties below the difference in the cost of production and not injure, exterminate, or embarrass the American industries upon which those duties are laid. One thing more: I commend to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee in the conference just about to come, the following telegram.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL. Just let me read this telegram as to the date when this bill shall go into effect.

Farmers, dealers, manufacturers, wholesale and retail clothiers, all carry large investments in raw and finished wool, therefore would recommend in the event of possibility of passage of wool bill, let a period of 9 to 12 months be allowed before bill takes effect. Early date as September might bankrupt many.

The La Follette bill provides for going into effect on the 1st of January, and the Democratic bill, if I am not mistaken, does the same thing. Even the Wilson bill, 18 years ago, recognizing that it took 8 to 12 months to manufacture and put woolen goods on the market, provided a difference of about 6 months between the time when the duty on wool and the duty on the finished product should go into effect. I commend that to the consideration of the chairman of the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know of anybody on this side who wants to talk now except Mr. UNDERWOOD.

Mr. PAYNE. If there is only one person on that side, very well.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think Mr. UNDERWOOD will close the debate and perhaps be the only one. Suppose the gentleman now yields to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. PAYNE. I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana if the gentleman will send for Mr. UNDERWOOD.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have sent for him; he is at luncheon.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, at the last session of Congress the so-called Underwood bill for the revision of the tariff on wool was passed by the House and sent to the Senate. The Senate substituted, as I understand, the same bill for the Underwood bill that it presents now. When the measure came back to the House the amendment was disagreed to and the bill was put into conference, and the result was the compromise bill that was vetoed by the President. We have traveled exactly along the same course up to this point in relation to the revision of the woolen schedule at this session of Congress, and it seems that gentlemen on the other side desire to put the same bill into conference again with the hope or expectation of compromising on substantially the same bill as before, with the expectation, I have no doubt—the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] almost expressed the hope—that it will be vetoed by the President, and there will be no legislation on the wool schedule at all.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Speaker, I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that no request for a conference has been made.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is involved in the proposition to disagree to the Senate amendment. It would almost of necessity mean a conference.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Not at all; there is no request for a conference being made by the House.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I wondered if the gentleman from New York in his remarks a few minutes ago expressed the sentiment of the Democratic side of the House when he, in effect, said the purpose of the Democrats was to practically defeat legislation upon the woolen schedule at this session of Congress, with the expectation that on the 4th day of next March there would be a Democratic President inaugurated, and then there would be a real Democratic revision of the tariff.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman be courteous enough to yield? I call attention to the fact the La Follette bill is not to go into effect until the 1st of next January.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is not a question of the date of its going into effect so much as the certainty of revising this important schedule. Besides, it would be necessary in a measure of this kind to provide that it shall not become operative until some time after its passage, so that business would have time to adjust itself. Let me ask gentlemen on the other side if it is their purpose and intention to prevent the revision of the woolen schedule until the next administration? If that is the attitude of the Democratic Party, let it be known to the country, let the Democratic side of the House carry the responsibility of defeating a measure which, if they would agree to now, would become a law.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The gentleman knows and every man on that side of the House knows that we have long desired to revise the woolen schedule, and if you will agree to the Underwood bill, you will have a revision now. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It looks to the ordinary citizen as if this question had been nursed along for campaign purposes. The Senate amendment will operate in a reduction of the duty on the woolen schedule of from 45 to 50 per cent all along the line. Here is an opportunity, gentlemen, to pass a bill that will reduce the duties on the clothing that the people of the country wear from 45 to 50 per cent. You have the opportunity to do it now.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Who is responsible for the delay?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We are not running the business of the House; we are in a helpless minority. I want to say a word in relation to the attitude of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]. He says the so-called La Follette proposition will reduce the duty on wool and woolen fabrics 16⅔ per cent below the rate of the Wilson tariff of 1894. I heard him not very long ago pronounce a very high encomium upon the Payne tariff, because it made the rates below the Wilson tariff.

Mr. HILL. On the whole 14 schedules.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. But the woolen schedule had no share in the glory of getting the duties down below the Wilson rate.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will yield the gentleman two minutes to answer this: Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] say whether he favors the Hill bill or whether he favors the La Follette bill?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If I had my way about it, I would enact the so-called Hill bill into law.

Mr. KITCHIN. Have you ever read it?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. With some degree of care.

Mr. KITCHIN. What is the difference between the Hill bill and the La Follette bill? How much is the difference in the rates?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There is some difference in the rates. I think the Hill bill is a little higher in some respects.

Mr. KITCHIN. Is not the Hill bill 25 per cent higher?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is not; and it is more equitable in a good many respects.

Mr. Speaker, my attitude is this: There is an opportunity now of passing a bill that may become a law. We may agree to the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], and that means conference. One bird in the hand is worth two in conference.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman believe that the President would sign the La Follette bill?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am not authorized to speak for him, but I think he would.

Mr. KITCHIN. If so, why did all the stand-pat Republicans of the Senate vote against it?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am not responsible for anything in the Senate.

Mr. HILL. Did the gentleman say that the Payne bill as now offered as a substitute was 25 per cent higher than the La Follette bill?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No, sir; I did not say that. I say the Senate amendment approximates the facts reported by the Tariff Board. That amendment provides a rate for a large class of fabrics at 55 per cent ad valorem. The rate on raw wool is 35 per cent. The rate on the fabric is 55 per cent, so the process of conversion of wool into cloth is protected by a 55 per cent rate plus the excess of the duty on raw wool of 20 per cent, and it seems to me that is high enough for protective purposes.

Mr. HILL. I wish to say that every individual member of the Tariff Board approves the bill of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I freely admit that the bill offered by the gentleman from Yew York [Mr. PAYNE] as a substitute for the Senate amendment, taken as a whole, is perhaps the most equitable and carefully prepared measure that has been submitted for consideration. As I said a moment ago, however, if that bill should be adopted as a substitute, the measure would be sent to the Senate and in all likelihood would go into conference. At this stage of the session it would mean that if the bill goes into conference the prospects for having an agreement between the two Houses and effective action would be very remote indeed. The Senate amendment which I have asked the House to agree to is a substantial embodiment of the essential facts contained in the Tariff Board's report. If the House should agree to that amendment the bill then would be ready to be submitted to the President for his approval. It is substantially different from the bill that passed the two Houses of Congress at the last session and was vetoed by the President. Furthermore, at that time the Tariff Board had made no report, and it was impossible for the President or anyone else to determine whether the bill that was submitted to him even approximately covered the difference in the cost of production here and in foreign countries. Conditions are different now. The report of the Tariff Board on the wool schedule has been before Congress over seven months, and careful examination of the report of the board will justify the conclusion that the Senate amendment substantially covers the difference in cost of production here and in foreign countries.

I am anxious for that amendment to prevail, because if it does I believe it means legislation. It means a thorough revision of the wool schedule. It means a reduction of the duties upon one of the great necessaries of life—from 45 per cent to 50 per cent on an average—and at the same time the maintenance of a rate of duties sufficiently high as to protect American manufacturers against disastrous foreign competition. It is of vital importance to have legislation at as early a date as is practicable, providing always that the legislation is wise and just. We are here offering our Democratic adversaries an opportunity to vote into law a provision that is safe and, from their standpoint, one that will relieve the consumers of woolen goods from a burden that our adversaries claim they have been unjustly carrying for many years.

They seem to hesitate because the measure is not one of their own creation, because it does not carry the label of "tariff for revenue only." They know full well that if the Senate amendment is not agreed to that the bill will go into conference and that it will either die there or that the conferees will report substantially the same bill that was reported last summer, which will be vetoed by the President. The President can not well do otherwise.

The country must know that all of this talk and pretense of revising the tariff schedules in the interest of the consumer is pure buncombe, read in the light of the action of the Democratic majority in this body. They stubbornly refuse to accept anything in the way of tariff revision that does not fully conform to their own unwise and dangerous policy. They will not accept a reduction of 50 per cent of the duties on wool, because they believe in a reduction of 60 per cent. If they can not get a whole loaf, they prefer no bread at all. If they can not secure for the people complete relief, from their own standpoint, they prefer to withhold from the people any relief at all. My judgment is that if their own bill were enacted into law it would paralyze the woolen industry in the country and throw hundreds of thousands of men and women out of employment and go a long way toward precipitating a general industrial panic.

We are told that the report of the Tariff Board is inaccurate and that it is subject to any one of a half dozen interpretations. These criticisms are unfair and unjust. It is true that the differences in the cost of production of woolen fabrics in this country and in foreign countries can not be ascertained to a mathematical certainty, because of the differences that exist in the cost of production in different individual mills and in different localities in the same country. One who studies the report of the Tariff Board with a view to finding facts that will authorize the maintenance of a very high duty upon woolens will accept the highest cost of production in this country as against the lowest cost of production in foreign countries, and upon this premise he will build a tariff that will be practically prohibitive. On the other hand, one who desires to eliminate all protective duties will study the report of the Tariff Board to find justification for advocating free trade. He will take the lowest cost of production in the United States and compare it with the highest cost of production in foreign countries and conclude that it costs as much to manufacture woolens abroad as it does at home, and therefore there is no need of a tariff on woolen fabrics at all.

Honest, unbiased, sensible men will discover in the report of the Tariff Board the average cost of the great volume of woolen fabrics manufactured abroad that may enter our ports and occupy our markets against home production, unless there is a duty to protect the home product. They will not take the cost of production in a mill here that may produce cheaply, or another there that may produce at a very high cost, but they will take the difference in the cost of production of the great bulk in this country as compared with the great bulk of other countries, and from a business standpoint will ascertain the rate of duty that will be necessary to protect the American producer, and at the same time not be sufficiently high as to enable him to extort undue prices for his products from the consumer. It is a business question to be worked out by business methods.

I have given the Senate amendment careful study, and I am satisfied that under its operation no American industry will suffer. I feel assured that the duties carried in that amendment are high enough to protect every legitimate woolen industry in this country against destructive competition from abroad.

The present tariff on wool is unduly high. It is unscientific and unbusinesslike. If the Senate amendment should be agreed to and become a law, this Congress will have to its credit the enactment of no more important item of legislation than that, nor one that will meet with more earnest commendation of the people.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of concurring in the Senate amendment, with the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. With regard to the Senate bill I would say that, however high the opinion of gentlemen may be concerning the qualities of the author of that bill, and I admit the justice of much that is said in his favor, he did not have the benefit when he drew it of the investigations made by the Tariff Board. I am in favor of the amendment submitted by the gentleman from New York, because it comes as near as the seven minority members of the Ways and Means Committee could bring it to conform with the report of the Tariff Board. And unless we are to have a revision of the wool schedule along lines on which we as a party are pledged to draw such a bill, then I frankly say that the responsibility should go to the other side of the House for drawing a bill according to their theory. I do not believe in mongrel tariff bills which represent neither party, which may do harm, and which may benefit nobody, and for which no single party can be held responsible.

I agree with much that was said by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON]. I trust that the result may show that he is a false prophet, but if he is correct in his prophecy that Mr. Wilson will be President of the United States on the 4th of next March, then his position is entirely logical. His party has been in the minority for 16 years, and now when they see the promised land before them they compromise away their position on the tariff and agree to a tariff bill which does not conform to their views in any respect. I should hardly like to follow the gentleman as a prophet, because I might have to imitate Cassandra and prophesy evil. But we will have the issue fairly drawn, and if after the 4th of next March the Democratic Party is to be in control in the country and is to frame tariff legislation according to their platform and according to the speeches of its leaders during this session, then the American people will have an opportunity to judge from the effect upon industry, from the derangement, as I believe, of production which will follow, and the evil consequences of their action, whether they want tariff legislation upon Democratic lines or upon Republican lines. But if we compromise, if both parties agree here to a measure that is neither Republican nor Democratic, then no party can be held responsible. I am willing that those gentlemen who have the responsibility, if we are not to have a Republican tariff bill, should bear either the glory or the ignominy of whatever the result may be. [Applause on the Republican side.]

With regard to the bill which is called the "La Follette bill," it is clear that it does not accord with the Tariff Board report as to rates upon many important items, and especially in the character of duties. The Tariff Board recommended specific duties and the La Follette bill is made up of ad valorem duties. I would like to see, as I said, the report of the Tariff Board embodied in law.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a very brief question?

Mr. McCALL. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is there not another essential difference in that it does not follow the recommendation of the Tariff Board to assess the duty upon the scoured pound, and not upon the pound of raw wool? Is not that one of the very essential differences?

Mr. McCALL. The gentleman from Ohio is correct about that.

Now, I do not wish to say much more in regard to the report of the Tariff Board, which has been often criticized upon the floor of this House, but I will quote an authority who I think is an authority of the first rank. He is weighty because of the position he has held upon the tariff in the past, in view of his eminence as an economic scholar, and of the world-wide reputation which he bears. Prof. Taussig, of Harvard University, in an article published not long ago concerning the report of the Tariff Board, concluded in these words:

> Economists will long find in these volumes a mine of information, and will be grateful for them when the political squabbles which now turn on them have been forgotten.

I wish to have a law passed here, as our party is pledged to pass one, based upon the report of the Tariff Board. But if we can not have a law on that basis, then let the Democratic Party assume the responsibility, and let them act upon their theories and embody them in law. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the report of this Tariff Board is the most remarkable document that has ever been presented to the Congress of the United States. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] states to this House, and I have no doubt in all good faith, so far as he is concerned, that his bill is sustained by the Tariff Board's report. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], at the other end of the Capitol, states to the Senate that his bill is sustained by the Tariff Board's report, and gentlemen on that side of the House assert that the La Follette bill should be passed, because the La Follette bill is written in conformity with the Tariff Board's report.

So far as I have been able to ascertain, the Tariff Board's report sustains the Democratic bill, so far as the report goes; and I want to challenge any man to point out where that report goes, in the ascertainment of facts of its own knowledge, beyond the question of a finding on raw wool and a finding on tops and a finding on yarn.

Now that is all the Tariff Board ever found as a matter of their own knowledge. It is true that they submitted certain samples of cloth to certain manufacturers in this country and abroad, asking them how much it would cost to make this sample in this country, and asking the foreign manufacturers how much it would cost to make it abroad—to make what they stated was a similar sample—and then they quote the statements of those manufacturers. Was that a finding of the Tariff Board? None whatever.

Now, outside of what they found on raw wool and on tops and on yarn, and these statements coming from third parties in reference to cloth, I challenge gentlemen to show me where they had made any statement about anything else in reference to the wool bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Does not the gentleman know that both the bill he had the honor to introduce and the bill that is now presented by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], with a motion to concur in the amendment, were written months before the Tariff Board made any report at all?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. HILL. So that if there is any real harmony between the two it is a mere guess. The only change in the La Follette bill is a reduction of 5 per cent from the bill written months before the Tariff Board report was made, and the House bill is the same bill, with no change whatever on the part of the gentleman from Alabama. If there is any harmony, it is a good guess, that is all.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not want the gentleman to take my time. I will yield to him all the time he wants. I am not contending that our bill was written on the report of the Tariff Board. I say the Tariff Board accepted the result of our findings and found the same result. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There is not any man that can deny the proposition that the Tariff Board's findings as to the duty that should be levied on tops sustained the Democratic bill, and that as to the duty which should be levied on yarn they sustained the Democratic bill, and you did not deny it when the bill was before the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, on cloth there is no finding whatever, I say, by the Tariff Board. They went out to some manufacturers to ascertain what it would cost to make cloth here and abroad, and then they came back here and gave that statement as a report, and I asked what the cloth was and who the manufacturers were; they declined to give the information to the Committee on Ways and Means. And yet you ask the Congress of the United States to write a tariff bill on a report of facts that were assembled by British and American wool manufacturers [applause on the Democratic side], and it is on that kind of a report that you and your President desire to deny relief to the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, as I stated, the items reported on by the Tariff Board are about half the number of items in the tariff bill, and your board made no report whatever on the other items—merely threw it out, without information or any desire to give us information.

There was nothing in the world for the Committee on Ways and Means to do after that report came in but to stand by the bill it had originally reported to this House. That bill cuts the tax on raw wool nearly in half. It cuts the tax on the finished product of the woolen manufacturers nearly in half. It reduces the wool schedule from an average of 90 per cent on manufactured wool to 42 per cent. It is not a drastic bill. It is a very moderate tariff bill. And, eliminating what the manufacturer has to pay in the way of tariff on raw wool, it still leaves to the American manufacturer of cloth 32 per cent ad valorem protection.

Now, when this total labor cost, as shown by the report, is only 21 per cent, and the difference in the labor cost is admitted by everyone to be only one-half, and 10 or 11 per cent ad valorem would equal the difference in labor cost, here is a bill that gives the manufacturer 32 per cent protection. Do you say that is drastic and unfair to the American manufacturer? It gives him more than an ample protection.

But the Democratic Committee on Ways and Means did not attempt to be radical in this matter. It did not pretend to be radical. The Democratic platform that was in existence when the bill was written favored a gradual reduction of these tariff rates, and we made a gradual reduction in this bill.

The Tariff Board report has been made. That was an excuse why the President would not sign the woolen bill. Gentlemen on that side predicted that this bill would never come back to the House. It is here. I am not in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. I am ready now and will be ready when this bill goes to conference to give relief to the American people, even if I can not give all the relief that I believe is right and fair and just. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ALLEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. ALLEN. Is it the purpose in sending the bill to conference to try to defeat legislation, or is it the intention to try to harmonize the differences between the two Houses and agree on a bill as speedily as possible?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that, of course, I can not answer for my colleagues on the committee. I am assuming that as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means I will be on the conference committee, and I will speak for myself. So far as I am concerned, my purpose is, if possible, to relieve the American people from the burden of taxation that now rests on them, and I should like to relieve them at once.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's motion so far has not asked for a conference.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not expect to ask for a conference now.

Mr. MANN. Because the Senate may recede?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There may be a question as to whether the Senate will recede. I will be perfectly candid with the gentleman and with the House. My reason in not asking for a conference now is because I prefer my bill to the compromise bill. If I can get my bill, I am going to try to get it.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. LENROOT. Would the gentleman prefer his bill vetoed to a compromise bill signed?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I believe there is a greater probability of the President of the United States signing the Democratic House wool bill than there is of his signing Senator LA FOLLETTE's bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I think there is very much stronger probability, and there is a reason for it. I will tell you why. The La Follette bill has made practically no reduction on raw wool. It has made a reduction on the finished product. The burden of the La Follette bill on the manufacturer will be very much heavier because of the high tax it puts on raw wool and because of the reduction on the finished product than the Democratic tariff bill will be. There is no use of concealing that fact. There is a broader margin between our tax on raw wool and the tax on the finished product than there is in the Senate mendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. But our bill, on the whole, is lower.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But our bill, on the whole, is lower than the Senate bill would be and less burden on the American people, because we do not put as high a tax on raw wool. That is the whole difference.

Mr. LENROOT. Which bill does the gentleman think offers greater competition from abroad?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think our bill does, because it is lower.

Mr. LENROOT. One more question. Is that to the interest of the American manufacturer, does the gentleman think?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The competition with the American manufacturer comes when you estimate his cost. You could leave the Payne tariff rate, averaging 90 per cent on the finished product, and put a high enough tax on raw wool to put the American manufacturer out of business, notwithstanding the fact that the present rate is purely prohibitory, because when you increase the manufacturer's cost here by increasing his cost of raw wool you enable the foreigner to come in and compete with him, because you cut down his margin of profit.

Mr. KITCHIN. Because the foreigner pays no duty on raw wool.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly. The foreigner pays no duty on raw wool. If you put the rate high enough on raw wool, even under the Payne law, you could put the manufacturer out of existence. And there is where I criticize the Senate bill. I say there is no justification for the Senate bill. Under the theory of protection, with the tax you have on raw wool, the report of the Tariff Board showed clearly, if it showed anything—and the report of the Tariff Board on raw wool was more full and complete than all the balance of their report put together—they showed conclusively that so far as territorial wool is concerned there was no necessity of levying any tariff whatever for the purpose of protection, and the only place where they held that a tariff was necessary to be levied for protection on raw wool was for the merino sheep in Ohio and that section of the country. There they said that your present tariff rate of 11 and 12 cents a pound was not high enough to protect the growing of that class of sheep, but they also said that the half-breed sheep that could be sold for mutton, that was raised in Ohio and that country, could be grown without any tariff protection whatever on the wool.

If we were writing the tax on the theory of protection, there is nothing in this Tariff Board report that would justify our putting one cent of tax on raw wool. The Democratic Party put a tax on raw wool, not for protection, but for the purpose of raising $17,000,000 revenue that we felt we could not dispense with. That is why we put the tax on raw wool.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Why, then, does the gentleman put raw wool on the free list, when it produces a very large revenue, when the gentleman admits that the revenue is necessary?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is a matter of discretion as to where you shall levy a tax for revenue, and the Democratic position on sugar recognized the fact that sugar produces a large amount of revenue; but we said that the tax on sugar went into the home of every man in the United States, high or low, rich or poor.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does not wool go into every home?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not as fully as sugar does. And we substituted for the $50,000,000 tax raised on sugar an excise tax to raise $60,000,000 from the pockets of the wealth of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] By that substitution we felt that we could put sugar on the free list, and the reason we have the tax on raw wool is for the purpose of raising revenue, and that alone. Therefore I say you can not go by this Tariff Board report. There is no man on that side of the House that dares say it is a full and complete report. There are no two men on that side of the House who can come to the same conclusion, if you locked them up in different rooms, as to what the Tariff Board's report means. As a matter of fact, when the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] brought in his bill before the Ways and Means Committee and submitted it as a substitute, the roll was called, and a record was taken—and therefore I am not disclosing the secrets of the committee that are not liable to be given out—and the balance of his colleagues did not vote, because they did not know what was in the bill, and he had to sustain the bill in the committee alone.

Mr. HILL. To what bill does the gentleman refer? Every one of them voted for it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The wool bill.

Mr. HILL. Why, certainly; it was presented upon the floor of the House by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If I am mistaken, Mr. Speaker, I apologize.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman is no more mistaken than in regard to many other things, but he has made a complete mistake in regard to this.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My recollection is that when the gentleman presented his bill before the committee his colleagues said they did not know what was in his bill and therefore would not vote for it.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman is entirely mistaken in reference to the wool bill. The bill was presented by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, some of my colleagues advise me that it was the gentleman's cotton bill in respect to which that happened.

Mr. HILL. Oh, we will take that up later.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But it was in reference to a Tariff Board report, and it merely illustrates the proposition I made—that after the gentleman had written a bill following the Tariff Board report on cotton, his own colleagues could not recognize it. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL. I am entirely prepared now to discuss that proposition. Does the gentleman desire to discuss the cotton question at this time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No.

Mr. HILL. Then I would suggest that he confine himself to the wool bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, my suggestion was that the gentleman from Alabama called up the cotton bill without notice, and I had not even read the cotton bill prepared by the gentleman from Connecticut, and I did not know anything about it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I hope that this House will send this bill back to the Senate, disagreeing to the Senate amendments. I hope when the bill goes to the Senate that body will change its mind and conclude to abandon its amendments and send this House bill to the President of the United States. If the Senate does that, then, in compliance with his pledges, in compliance with his statement to the American people that after a tariff board had given Congress the information it desired he was in favor of legislation, he will be compelled to sign the bill. If a Democratic House and a Republican Senate send him legislation, I contend that he can not refuse to sign it without stultifying himself before the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But if the Senate of the United States concludes not to accept the House bill and insists on its amendments and asks for a conference, then the committee on conference, at least those representing this side of the House, will go to that conference in the hope that they can reach an agreement that will ultimately secure relief to the American people.

Mr Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to concur with an amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Clerk called the roll; and there were—yeas 78, nays 158, answered "present" 8, not voting 146, as follows:

Mr. FORNES with Mr. BRADLEY.
Mr. RIORDAN with Mr. ANDRUS.
Mr. BARTLETT with Mr. BUTLER.
Mr. TURNBULL with Mr. HAYES.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I find I am paired with Mr. SCULLY, of New Jersey. I voted "aye." I desire to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The name of Mr. BROWNING was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Speaker, I voted "aye," and I am paired with my colleague Mr. PETERS, and I desire to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The SPEAKER. Call the gentleman's name.

The name of Mr. MCCALL was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. DWIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with Mr. LITTLETON, of New York. I voted "aye," and desire to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The SPEAKER. Call the gentleman's name.

The name of Mr. DWIGHT was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. BARTLETT. I find he is absent. I voted "aye," and I would like to withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER. Call the gentleman's name.

The name of Mr. BUTLER was called, and he answered "Present."

The SPEAKER. Call my name.

The name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri was called, and he voted "no."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is—did the gentleman from Indiana want to offer his motion?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I thought it was pending; if it is not, I move the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays on the vote.

The SPEAKER. Forty-three gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number. It takes 46——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the other side. The negative was taken.

The SPEAKER. On this vote the ayes are 43, the noes are 192; 43 is a sufficient number, and the Clerk will call the roll. [Applause.] This vote is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to concur in the Senate amendment.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 56, nays 179, answered "present" 7, not voting 148, as follows:

So the motion to concur in the Senate amendment was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. SIMS with Mr. HARRIS.

Mr. MAYS with Mr. THISTLEWOOD.

For the vote:

Mr. JACKSON (to concur) with Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey (against).

Mr. MAYS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to change my vote from "nay" to "present."

The name of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MAYS] was called, and he voted "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri was called, and he voted "nay."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] is rejected, and that carries with it the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to disagree to the Senate amendment.

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the motion to concur in the Senate amendment was rejected was laid on the table.

EXCISE TAX.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 21214, known as the excise-tax bill, for the purpose of considering the Senate amendments, and, pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the Senate amendments to the excise bill, and, pending that, he asks unanimous consent that the amendments may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman that I have no objection to that order. I want a separate vote on amendments Nos. 12 and 13, one with reference to the repeal of the reciprocity act and one with reference to the Tariff Board.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There will be no objection on my part to the gentleman getting that.

The SPEAKER. What is the agreement?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have just stated to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that there would be no attempt to prevent his getting a separate vote on those amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] gives notice that he desires a separate vote on amendments numbered 12 and 13, one on reciprocity and one on the Tariff Board.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Is it not true that a separate vote would have to be taken on every amendment except by unanimous consent otherwise?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the gentleman is correct about it.

Mr. MANN. Would not a separate vote have to be taken on every amendment except by unanimous consent otherwise?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so. Is there objection to the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, one or two gentlemen who have spoken on the other bill desire unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD. I do not ask it for myself.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that those gentlemen who spoke on the wool bill when it was pending before the House have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that all Members who spoke on the wool bill shall have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments to the excise bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, unless there is a desire on the part of some gentlemen on the other side of the House to have a vote on the other amendments to this bill—and most of them are technical amendments, except the two amendments indicated by the gentleman from New York, namely, 12 and 13—I ask unanimous consent to disagree to the other Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to disagree to all the Senate amendments except those as to reciprocity and the Tariff Board. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from New York desires to make his motion——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the amendment numbered 12.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, on that motion I would like to agree with the gentleman from New York as to how much time he wants.

Mr. PAYNE. No gentleman has spoken to me in regard to time. I do not know of anyone who wishes it, unless it is the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If no gentleman on that side desires time, I would like to have a vote.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know whether any gentleman desires time or not.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on amendment numbered 12 in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] makes the same request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on amendment numbered 12.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I make a similar request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] submits a similar request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on amendment No. 12. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent that gentlemen who desire to speak on amendment No. 12, the repeal of the Canadian reciprocity pact, may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who desire to do so may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the Canadian reciprocity pact. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in Senate amendment No. 12.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker, if gentlemen do not desire to discuss the amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the proposition.

The SPEAKER. Is this the reciprocity amendment that is to be voted on now?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; it is the repeal of the reciprocity bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the amendment be reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TOWNSEND] asks that the amendment be reported. Without objection, the Clerk will report Senate amendment No. 12.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

(12) SEC. 11. That the act entitled "An act to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes," approved July 26, 1911, be, and is hereby, repealed: Provided, That from and after the passage of this act the duty on chemical wood pulp shall be one-twelfth of 1 cent per pound, dry weight, if unbleached, and one-eighth of 1 cent per pound if bleached, and the duty on printing paper as described in paragraph 409 of the act approved August 5, 1909, shall be one-tenth of 1 cent per pound if valued at not above 3 cents per pound, two-tenths of 1 cent per pound if valued above 3 cents and not above 5 cents per pound, and 7½ per cent ad valorem if valued above 5 cents per pound.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] moves to concur in Senate amendment numbered 12, and on that motion he demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. Those in favor of repealing the reciprocity pact will vote "yea" when their names are called; those opposed will vote "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 107, nays 126, answered "present" 8, not voting 149, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and he voted "nay," as above recorded.

So the motion to concur in Senate amendment No. 12 was lost.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

For the session:

Mr. GLASS with Mr. SLEMP.

On the vote:

Mr. PETERS with Mr. FARR.

Mr. JACKSON (for repeal) with Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey (against).

Until further notice:

Mr. SULZER with Mr. MATTHEWS.

Mr. PUJO with Mr. MCGUIRE of Oklahoma.

Mr. RODDENBERY with Mr. J. M. C. SMITH.

Mr. BRANTLEY with Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota.

Mr. COLLIER with Mr. MONDELL.

Mr. DWIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I voted "yea," but I find that I am paired with my colleague from New York, Mr. LITTLETON, and I wish to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. DWIGHT, and he answered "Present."

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, am I recorded as voting?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recorded.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The motion to concur in the Senate amendment is lost, which is equivalent to the adoption of a motion to disagree.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that Senate amendment No. 13 be reported.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

(13) SEC. 12. That a board is hereby created, to be known as the Tariff Board, which shall be composed of five members, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The members first appointed under this act shall continue in office from the date of qualification for the terms of two, three, four, five, and six years, respectively, from and after the first day of October, A. D. 1912, the term of each to be designated by the President; but their successors shall be appointed for terms of six years, except that any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the member whom he shall succeed. The President shall designate a member of the board to be the chairman thereof during the term for which he is appointed. Any member may, after due hearing, be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. Not more than three members of said board shall be members of the same political party. Three members of said board shall constitute a quorum. The chairman of said board shall receive a salary of $7,500 per annum and the other members each a salary of $7,000 per annum. The board shall have authority to appoint a secretary and fix his compensation, and to appoint and fix the compensation of such other employees as it may find necessary to the performance of its duties.

That the principal office of said board shall be in the city of Washington. The board, however, shall have full authority, as a body, by one or more of its members, or through its employees, to conduct investigations at any other place or places, either in the United States or foreign countries, as the board may determine. All the expenses of the board, including all necessary expenses for transportation incurred by the members or by their employees under their orders, in making any investigations, or upon official business in any other places than in Washington, shall be allowed and paid on the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor, approved by the chairman of the board. Should said board require the attendance of any witness, either in Washington or any place not the home of said witness, said witness shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States.

That it shall be the duty of said board to investigate the cost of production of all articles which by any act of Congress now in force or hereafter enacted are made the subject of tariff legislation, with special reference to the prices paid domestic and foreign labor and the prices paid for raw materials, whether domestic or imported, entering into manufactured articles, producers' prices and retail prices of commodities, whether domestic or imported, the cost of transportation from the place or places of production to the principal areas of consumption, the condition of domestic and foreign markets affecting the American products, including detailed information with respect thereto, together with all other facts which may be necessary or convenient in fixing import duties or in aiding the President and other officers of the Government in the administration of the customs laws, and said board shall also make investigation of any such subject whenever directed by either House of Congress.

That to enable the President to secure information as to the effect of tariff rates, restrictions, exactions, or any regulations imposed at any time by any foreign country upon the importation into or sale in any such foreign country of any products of the United States, and as to any export bounty paid or export duty imposed or prohibition made by any country upon the exportation of any article to the United States which discriminates against the United States or the products thereof, and to assist the President in the application of the maximum and minimum tariffs and other administrative provisions of the customs laws, the board shall, from time to time, make report, as the President shall direct.

That for the purposes of this act said board shall have power to subpœna witnesses, to take testimony, administer oaths, and to require any person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association engaged in the production, importation, or distribution of any article under investigation to produce books and papers relating to any matter pertaining to such investigation. In case of failure to comply with the requirements of this section, the board may report to Congress such failure, specifying the names of such persons, the individual names of such firm or copartnership, and the names of the officers and directors of each such corporation or association so failing, which report shall also specify the article or articles produced, imported, or distributed by such person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association, and the tariff schedule which applies to such article.

That in any investigation authorized by this act the board may obtain such evidence or information as it may deem advisable, but said board shall not be required to divulge the names of persons furnishing such evidence or information; and no evidence or information so secured under the provisions of this section from any person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association shall be made public by said board in such manner as to be available for the use of any business competitor or rival.

That said board shall submit the results of its investigations, as hereinbefore provided, including all testimony, together with any explanatory report of the facts so ascertained, to the President or to either House of Congress, from time to time, when called upon by the President or either House of Congress.

That upon the taking effect of this act the body now known as the Tariff Board shall transfer to the Tariff Board hereby created all such property and equipment, books and papers as are now possessed or used by said first-mentioned board in connection with the subjects for which the Tariff Board is hereby created, and thereupon the said first-mentioned board shall cease to exist.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment; and if no gentleman desires to speak——

Mr. LONGWORTH. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I desire to know if this amendment is in the same language as the bill that passed the Senate on the 3d of last March and came over to the House and was beaten in the closing days of the session?

Mr. PAYNE. It is substantially the same bill, but not exactly. There is a provision in this which I think was not in the bill to which the gentleman refers. That provision is that the board shall report to either House of Congress.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That was in that bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Then I think it is substantially the same bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is the Tariff Board bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to occupy the time of the House but five minutes.

I wish to say to the House that this amendment placed on the excise bill is an amendment to enact into law the Tariff Board provision that the House has voted on several times before. It is to enact into law the same Tariff Board provision that was proposed in the last Congress, practically, and that has been proposed in this Congress.

I have an objection to this legislation, and had the same objection to the proposal to repeal the Canadian reciprocity treaty being included in this excise tax bill. The excise bill has been agreed to by the Senate. It has been agreed to by this House. It is the greatest piece of remedial legislation for the benefit of the masses of the American people that has been passed in a quarter of a century. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It proposes to put fifty million or sixty million dollars of the burdens of taxation on the wealth of the country, and to enable the Congress to remove it from the backs of the American people. [Applause.] I think if you had voted a few minutes ago to put a provision in this bill to repeal the Canadian reciprocity pact, you would have sent the bill to the President of the United States expecting a veto as soon as it got there. You would have rung its death knell before you sent it from your hands, and I do not think we ought to jeopardize this bill by putting any amendments on it that are foreign to the real purpose of this act.

In the next place the Senate, under the Constitution of the United States, has no right to originate tariff legislation. This is a proposition that is not germane to the original bill, that has no right on it and no place on it. The gentlemen on that side of the House who believe in a Tariff Board, if they are honest and earnest on that question, have a fair forum in which to fight their battles. They have their proposition on the sundry civil bill to-day. They can fight it out on the sundry civil bill, which is one of the great supply bills of this country. They do not need to jeopardize this great excise-tax bill by trying to complicate its provisions by putting upon it amendments to which they know this side of the House can not agree.

As to the Tariff Board proposition itself, this side of the House has met that issue fairly, and its proposition on that subject will become a law. When the legislative bill was before the House we provided for a bureau of domestic and foreign commerce in the Department of Commerce and Labor. That amendment was adopted by the House, and I understand it stands in the bill ratified by the Senate. In that provision for a bureau of domestic and foreign commerce is a paragraph authorizing the bureau to do absolutely all the investigation that is provided for in this bill and providing that it shall report to Congress.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. In that provision was there any larger appropriation given than always has been given for the performance of the functions of the Bureau of Manufactures? Therefore, is there any way for it to do any tariff work?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is no appropriation in this proposition at all; and as to the appropriation, it must go to the gentleman's committee anyhow to get the money. The Committee on Ways and Means have no control of appropriations.

Mr. GILLETT. But the provision which the gentleman speaks of does not make any appropriation at all, beyond such as has always been given for the Bureau of Manufactures.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But it puts the law there, and when the Secretary calls on Congress for the appropriation I have no doubt it will be given. This provision could not work unless Congress gave the money, so there is nothing in that contention at all. But the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] knows, because he is on the conference committee, that my statement is correct when I say that in that bill there is a provision, put there by this Democratic House, authorizing as full and as ample investigation as to all facts on which a tariff bill could be written as is provided in this amendment. It provides that the report shall be made to this House, and there is no reason for your adopting this amendment unless you want to jeopardize the passage and the approval of an honest bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the provision in the legislative appropriation bill referred to by the gentleman from Alabama was not an extension of authority to make investigations, but was a restriction of existing authority. It provided for one bureau instead of two that now exist, and instead of increasing the chance to obtain information it decreases the opportunity. The gentleman's excuse for opposing this amendment is the most peculiar excuse that he has ever been called upon to make. With the Senate in favor of the proposition, with the President of the United States known to be in favor of it, he says the House should disagree to the amendment for fear that by agreeing to it we will jeopardize the bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Illinois misunderstood my statement. I said that it was put on here for the purpose of jeopardizing this bill; that the man who placed it on here knew that this side of the House was opposed to the passage of it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. But no gentleman on the other side of the House can excuse himself for voting against the amendment on the ground that it may jeopardize the bill. If that side of the House to-day, with the opportunity before it, agrees to this amendment, the final approval of the President of the United States is already written upon the law. [Applause on the Republican side.] Gentlemen over there are jeopardizing the bill by refusing to accept a proposition which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] himself only a year ago favored in the Committee on Ways and Means and in the House. It is the same proposition reported from the Committee on Ways and Means in the last Congress by a unanimous vote. [Applause on the Republican side.] But now the gentleman is afraid of his own shadow, afraid he will jeopardize the bill by adding an amendment to it that all Republicans are in favor of.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. The gentleman is the leader of the Republicans. He is the mouthpiece, or should be, of the administration. I want to ask him if we agree to put this amendment No. 12, repealing the Canadian reciprocity, onto this excise tax bill, does the gentleman from Illinois believe the President of the United States would sign it?

Mr. MANN. We have disposed of that amendment. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] That is a last year's bird's nest. The gentleman hides behind that amendment in an endeavor to defeat this amendment. I do not wonder that he is afraid to meet the issue on this amendment, and seeks to divert attention to the other amendment. This amendment is now before the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the gentleman has not yet answered my question.

Mr. MANN. And if the gentlemen on that side of the aisle are in favor of a tariff board, let them vote for this amendment. If they are opposed to a tariff board, let them vote against the amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the gentleman has not yet answered my question. I am inquiring for information, and I am going to the source of authority.

Mr. MANN. I do not know, if that is what the gentleman wants to know. But if the gentleman desires to advance the passage of this bill, if he wants to make it so that Republicans can support and defend it, so that a Republican President can approve it, so that a Republican Senate will agree to it, let him yield now his fear and go back to where he stood a year ago and vote for the proposition which he then favored and which we all now favor. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 99, nays 130, answered "present" 8, not voting 153, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and he answered "No."

So the motion to concur was rejected.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall and listening when his name was called?

Mr. SLAYDEN. No.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. SLAYDEN with Mr. MATTHEWS.

Mr. ROBINSON with Mr. DRAPER.

Mr. LEVER with Mr. HENRY of Connecticut.

Mr. KINDRED with Mr. HIGGINS.

Mr. HAMILL with Mr. LAFFERTY.

Mr. COLLIER with Mr. KOPP.

Mr. BOOHER with Mr. SMITH of California.

Mr. SABATH with Mr. FARR.

Mr. LAMB with Mr. HAUGEN.

Mr. PETERS with Mr. MCCALL.

On the vote:

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey (against) with Mr. JACKSON (to concur).

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from New York to concur having been defeated, that carries with it the proposition to disagree.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the votes and to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the House ask for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes on the excise bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House ask for a conference on the excise bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees:

Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. HULL, Mr. PALMER, Mr. PAYNE, and Mr. MCCALL.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 18041. An act granting a franchise for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a street railway system in South Hilo, county of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii; and

H. R. 16518. An act for the relief of the Fifth-Third National Bank of Cincinnati, Ohio.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution of the following title:

S. J. Res. 127. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to supply tents and rations to American citizens compelled to leave Mexico.

SUGAR SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, under the unanimous-consent agreement of last evening I ask to take from the Speaker's table the sugar bill for present consideration in the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks for the present consideration of the sugar bill, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 21213) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. MANN. That has already been given. I ask that the Senate amendment be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That six months from and after the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid the rates of duty which are prescribed in the paragraphs of this act upon the articles hereinafter enumerated, when imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), and the said paragraphs and sections shall constitute and be a substitute for paragraphs 216 and 217 of section 1 of an act entitled 'An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes,' approved August 5, 1909.

"First. Sugars, tank bottoms, sirups of cane juice, melada, concentrated melada, concrete, and concentrated molasses, testing by the polariscope not above 75°, ninety-five one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound, and for each additional degree shown by the polariscope test, twenty-six one-thousandths of 1 cent per pound additional, and fractions of a degree in proportion; molasses testing not above 40°, 20 per cent ad valorem; testing above 40° and not above 56°, 3 cents per gallon; testing above 56°, 6 cents per gallon; sugar drainings and sugar sweepings shall be subject to duty as molasses or sugar, as the case may be, according to polariscope test: Provided, That every bag, barrel, or parcel in which sugar testing by the polariscope less than 99° is packed shall be plainly branded by the manufacturer or refiner thereof with the name of such manufacturer or refiner, and the polariscope test of the sugar therein contained, accurately within one-half of 1°, and a failure to brand any such bag, barrel, or parcel as herein required shall be deemed and taken to be a misbranding of food within the meaning of the act of June 30, 1906, entitled 'An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes.' And the requirements of this proviso shall not apply to any sugar shipped or delivered to a refiner to be refined before entering into consumption.

"Second. Maple sugar and maple sirup, 4 cents per pound; glucose or grape sugar, 1½ cents per pound; sugar cane in its natural state or unmanufactured, 20 per cent ad valorem; sugar cane defecated, shredded, artificially dried, or which has been subjected to any manufacturing or other process, 50 per cent ad valorem.

"Third. That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to abrogate or in any manner impair or affect the provisions of the treaty of commercial reciprocity concluded between the United States and the Republic of Cuba on the 11th day of December, 1902, or the provisions of the act of Congress heretofore passed for the execution of the same, and that upon the taking effect of this act all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions hereof shall be repealed."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have not a print of the bill before me, but I understand there is but one Senate amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. That is all.

The SPEAKER. That seems to be the case.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is that correct?

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman from New York desire to consume some time?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to use about five minutes. The bill has not been printed, except in the RECORD, and I think a word or two in regard to the changes that have been made will not be amiss. The bill eliminates the Dutch standard of test of sugar. Dr. Wiley testified not long since that for 20 years this test of the Dutch standard in color had not been used and had gone into an innocuous desuetude, and it made no difference whether it was used or not. On the contrary, there are some gentlemen who believe, with this test of color, there will come into use again what many of us remember from our boyhood days—an article of bright yellow sugar—that was bought by the farmers of the country, the mechanics, and so forth, and used in the family and took the place of the present white sugar. I remember when Gov. Gear was a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, when we were making the McKinley bill. He had a great deal to say in regard to restoring this sugar so that it might be purchased by the people of the country at a lower price than after going through the process of refining. Gentlemen believe this will restore that sugar to commerce of the country and consumption. If it does so, of course it would cheapen the price of sugar, and in order that people may know what kind of sugar they are buying when it is not refined, there is a provision in this bill that all packages containing sugar under 99 degrees of purity shall be labeled under the pure-food act, and that the penalties under that act shall apply so that the people of the country may know what sort of sugar they are buying and the degree of purity of that sugar. That becomes quite necessary, of course, if this sugar goes into use. This is not required for the sugar going into the refineries, because there is no necessity for it, and, of course, that will save money in the cost of refining the sugar. Some people believe it will save a good deal to the consumer. My faith is a little weak, but I am willing to accept that; and certainly there should be a difference in this sugar from that which goes in the melting pots to be refined.

Of course, gentlemen know sugar is produced in this country to the extent of 900,000 tons, 600,000 of beet sugar and 300,000 of cane, and that the islands, including Hawaii, produce some 800,000 or 900,000 tons. The total of the sugar that goes into the melting pots for refining is 2,800,000 tons, and 1,800,000 tons of that sugar comes from Cuba at 20 per cent less than the duties provided for sugar coming from other countries. In 1910 74,000 tons of sugar only were imported into this country which paid the full duty coming from other foreign countries than Cuba. Last year it was 199,000 tons because of the shortage of the crop in Cuba. The domestic production in Cuba is restricted to sugar used in the United States. The present duty on sugar is ninety-five one-hundredths of a cent per pound on sugar which is 75 degrees and less, with an additional duty for each additional degree of purity of thirty-five one-thousandths of 1 cent per pound; or, to put it down in English, 95 cents a hundred pounds and 3½ cents additional for each additional degree of sugar over 75 degrees. This amendment fixes the duty of 95 cents a hundred pounds of the 75-degree sugar and adds 2.6 cents per hundred pounds for every additional degree, so that the duty on sugar of 99 or 100 degrees would be 1.60 per hundred pounds. Now it is 1.90, so with that degree of purity of sugar 30 cents a hundred pounds is the reduction.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. I will have to ask five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request for the extension of the gentleman's time? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I have never been able to understand why a majority of the Committee on Ways and Means are seeking to separate the United States from all other civilized countries in the world by their endeavor to remove the duty on sugar and provide a revenue in some other way different from all other civilized countries. Every other civilized country has a revenue duty on sugar. Great Britain has 40 cents per hundred pounds, Denmark $1.22 per hundred pounds, and other countries have a larger duty than the United States under the present law.

It has always been recognized by economists as a splendid revenue duty, and never has it been departed from except for a short time under the McKinley bill, and under these circumstances and because the tariff revenue laws were producing such an immense amount of revenue that we had bought up all the bonds in sight in order to dispose of it, and were depositing the surplus of the Treasury in the national banks, and there was a great hue and cry over these accumulating deposits, and we were seeking to reduce the revenue, we took the duty off of sugar and protected the interest by a bounty in 1890. I think that that was a mistake. I am perfectly willing to acknowledge it when I discover that I have made a mistake. I voted for that, but I think it was a mistake economically and politically. It was a mistake as a public matter and a public question.

Now this committee takes off the duty on sugar entirely after we have increased the production of beet sugar from some 18,000 tons in 1890, when the McKinley bill was passed, to 606,000 tons under the protection that sugar has enjoyed since. We have reached that point where we can see clearly that in a few years we can produce all the sugar used in the United States in our own domestic industries and our possessions. We can now produce it all in our own domestic industries and our islands, except with the addition of the sugar that comes from Cuba at a lower rate of duty. There was no one demanding that the duty be taken off of the sugar except the sugar refiners, and they were very honest and frank about it. They said they wanted it because they wanted to destroy the beet-sugar industry. Why? That came into market for three months in the year and interfered with their markets in the Mississippi Valley. They marketed that "beet sugar right in our markets," as these refiners said, and they marketed it at a lower price, and consequently it cut down the price of the refined sugar, and it cut off the profits. So they were the ones who were asking before the Hardwick committee that the duty should be reduced or taken off of sugar entirely, just as they asked three years ago from the committee over which I had the honor to preside. They wanted it all taken off. Then they could get along without any differential duty on refining. This bill takes off 7½ cents a hundred, the differential duty now that the refiner has had to protect him in the process of refining. He does not need it. The amendment takes it off, and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] wants five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, if the Democratic majority desired tariff legislation for the purpose of relieving taxation of the American people, they would vote to concur in this amendment now. They have no such desire, however. It has been made plain that their pressing of tariff legislation is for political purposes only, and it has been made especially plain to-day by the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], concerning which I want to make a few comments.

He stated very frankly—I commend him for his candor and I have no doubt that he spoke for a majority of the Members on that side of the aisle—that he was not in favor of any tariff legislation going to the President of the United States unless that legislation was framed according to Democratic principles. Now, the gentleman knows that any tariff legislation going to the President of the United States based upon a tariff for revenue only will meet with a presidential veto, and the gentleman stated that he preferred to wait until after the 4th of next March before seriously attempting any tariff revision, because then he could secure the legislation squarely along Democratic lines. Now, I want to ask the other side, Mr. Speaker, if that is so, why they have pressed this legislation at all. [Applause on the Republican side.] Can they claim that they have been in good faith in doing so? Why was this bill reported out from the Committee on Ways and Means if they are in good faith and if the gentleman from New York spoke for the Democratic majority? He knows that unless this bill goes to the President carrying protective duties it will meet with a veto, and he knows that any bill meeting with a veto denies any relief to the American people. So, Mr. Speaker, those of us upon this side of the aisle who are in favor of real tariff revision propose by their votes this afternoon to say that we intend to reduce the cost of living to the American people now, while you gentlemen on the other side propose to wait until next year. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman made another statement. He said that it was the consumers and not the producers of the country that sent the Democratic majority here. Mr. Speaker, I know of but two classes of people in this country who are not producers but are consumers only. They are the idle rich and the hoboes, concerning whom my friend from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] has often spoken so very eloquently [applause on the Republican side], and it was a matter of considerable surprise to me to have the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] assert that it was those classes—the idle rich and the hobo—that furnished the Democratic majority upon that side of the aisle. [Applause on the Republican side.] But, Mr. Speaker, we must remember that the gentleman comes from the great city of New York, and he is unfair to the Democratic Party in the country as a whole, because I know a great many good Democrats who are neither idle rich or hoboes.

But, Mr. Speaker, one other illustration to show the attitude of the Democratic Party. Nearly two months ago we had a steel schedule come back to this House with a reciprocity repeal attached to it.

There was an opportunity for you upon that side of the aisle—if you are sincere in wanting tariff revision now—to have concurred in that Senate amendment. It has gone into conference, and has been sleeping there for 60 days, and will sleep there until the end of the session; and you on that side of the aisle have now made a record of the fact that you prefer these high tariff duties upon steel products rather than to repeal reciprocity. You are wedded to the reciprocity issue, but you will find next November that as to many, many of you on that side of the aisle you will wish you could forget it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, unless some gentleman on that side of the House desires to speak, I would like to ask unanimous consent to close debate in five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that the debate be closed in five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the proposition that is pending before the House is a Senate amendment to a House bill that places sugar on the free list and will give to the American people a reduction of practically 2 cents a pound on sugar. In place of that the Senate sends back to the House an amendment removing the Dutch standard and the differential from the present sugar schedule and reducing the present tariff tax on sugar from $1.90 a hundred pounds to $1.60 a hundred pounds.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the only way in which you can reduce the price of sugar is to produce competition, and I am satisfied in my own mind and from the testimony of everybody that I have heard on this subject that the reduction of this rate in this bill from $1.90 to $1.60 would not bring about that competition which would reduce the price of sugar to the American people. And yet the Senate bill will cost the Treasury of the United States $5,500,000 annually in loss of revenue.

Now, why should we incur a loss of $5,500,000 of revenue to the Treasury that will go into the coffers of the sugar refiners, and nobody else, unless you are going to reduce the price of sugar to the American consumer?

I am not in favor of the Senate bill. I do not think that any man that is in favor of a real reduction in the cost of living to the American people can stand for this bill under any circumstances. You pass this bill and let it become a law, and what will be the result? Before 60 days have passed you will find that sugar is selling to your constituents at the same price as it is to-day, and you will have given to the refiners of sugars in this country $5,500,000 out of the Treasury of the United States.

That is the legislation that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] want you to agree to. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If you are going to deprive the Government of the United States of its revenue, then I say do it in such a way that the American people will get the benefit of the reduction. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Do not let us go to the country with any subterfuge. Let us make an honest reduction. If you agree to the bills that we have passed, that we have offered to a Republican Senate, we will relieve the American people of $115,000,000 of burden that rests on them to-day by reason of this sugar tax [applause on the Democratic side], and we will put in place of it an excise-tax bill that will raise $60,000,000 and more than compensate the Treasury for the loss of the tax that we remove from sugar. We remove that tax of $115,000,000 from the American people and the consuming masses of the American people, and we place that tax on the wealth of this country, that can well bear the burden. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

That is the issue which the gentlemen on that side of the House ask you to-day to compromise. Can you go to your constituents with a compromise of that kind?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question at that point?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is it not a fact that all but two of the gentleman's own party voted for this precise proposition in the Senate?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know what the vote in the Senate is, or was, and I am not responsible for it.

Mr. COX of Indiana. And you do not care.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know what the vote of this House is, and this House represents the only Democratic body that is in authority in this Government. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] that this sugar bill that was passed by this House and this excise bill have met the approval of the Democratic Party in its convention. In the highest tribunal of the party these bills have received the approval of the Democratic masses of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Do I understand that the Members of the gentleman's party in the other body are out of touch with the Democratic sentiment in this country?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not responsible for their action. I am not here to speak for them, but I am here to speak for the Democratic Party in this House on this question. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I say that it would be a repudiation of the promises that we have made to the people, as confirmed by our convention, unless we insisted that the relief that we have demanded for the American people should be honestly carried out. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 84, nays 144, answered "present" 7, not voting 155, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and he voted in the negative.

So the motion of Mr. PAYNE to concur in the Senate amendments was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. SAUNDERS with Mr. CURRY.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY with Mr. PRINCE.

Mr. REDFIELD with Mr. BARTHOLDT.

On this vote:

Mr. COVINGTON (against) with Mr. ESCH (to concur).

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey (against) with Mr. JACKSON (to concur).

For the balance of the day:

Mr. WEBB with Mr. VOLSTEAD.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to concur is lost, which is equivalent to a vote to nonconcur.

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House ask a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on this bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. HARRISON of New York, Mr. KITCHIN, Mr. PAYNE, and Mr. MCCALL.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, July 31, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. HAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 99) authorizing the President to reassemble the court-martial which on August 16, 1911, tried Ralph I. Sasse, Ellicott H. Freeland, Tattnall D. Simpkins, and James D. Christian, cadets of the Corps of Cadets of the United States Military Academy, and sentenced them, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1116), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 25035) granting to the Ozark Power & Water Co. authority to construct a dam across White River, Mo., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1114), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 26007) to authorize the building of a dam across the Coosa River, in Alabama, at a place suitable to the interest of navigation about 7½ miles above the city of Wetumpka, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1115), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calandar.

Mr. PEPPER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8141) to further increase the efficiency of the Organized Militia of the United States, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1117), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII:

Mr. DICKINSON, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 3452) for the relief of Drenzy A. Jones and John G. Hopper, joint contractors for surveying Yosemite Park boundary, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1113), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18531) granting a pension to Alloyed M. Smith and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. HOBSON: A bill (H. R. 26043) providing for the construction, erection, maintenance, and operation of a dam across the Sipsey River, in Pickens County, Ala., for the purpose of the development of water power; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. COVINGTON: A bill (H. R. 26044) to authorize aids to navigation and other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. KENT: A bill (H. R. 26045) to establish a subport of entry and delivery at Fort Bragg, in the State of California; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CURRY: A bill (H. R. 26046) granting to the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. a right of way through the Fort Wingate Military Reservation in New Mexico, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CURLEY: A bill (H. R. 26047) establishing compensation of certain customs officials; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. AKIN of New York: Resolution (H. Res. 652) requesting information from the Secretary of the Interior and Secretary of Agriculture; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, resolution (H. Res. 653) requesting information from the Secretary of Agriculture; to the Committee on Agriculture.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BARCHFELD: A bill (H. R. 26048) for the relief of the estate of Richard W. Meade, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CLARK of Missouri: A bill (H. R. 26049) granting an increase of pension to Joseph A. Lupton; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CRAGO: A bill (H. R. 26050) granting a pension to Lennie Anne Shunk; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey: A bill (H. R. 26051) granting a pension to John Kennedy; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LEE of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 26052) granting an increase of pension to Margaret L. Ramsey; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PICKETT: A bill (H. R. 26053) to correct the military record of William A. Blades; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. RICHARDSON: A bill (H. R. 26054) for the relief of the estate of John M. Wright, deceased; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. RUBEY: A bill (H. R. 26055) granting a pension to Samuel H. Barr; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 26056) granting a pension to Minnie J. Cotrell; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio: A bill (H. R. 26057) for the relief of Mathias Keith; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. VOLSTEAD: A bill (H. R. 26058) granting a pension to Margaret Prescott; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. CURRY: Petition of citizens within the Fort Sumner (N. Mex.) land district, favoring the withdrawal of the clause in the sundry civil appropriation bill abolishing the office of the receiver of the land office; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. FULLER: Petition of W. Atler Burfee, against passage of the Bourne parcel-post bill; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. SULZER: Petition of W. Atlee Burpee, of Philadelphia, Pa., against passage of the Bourne parcel-post bill; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, petition of the committee of Wholesale Grocers, New York, favoring reduction of tariff on all raw and refined sugar; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 31, 1912.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

Mr. CULBERSON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The reading will proceed.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the Journal.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

Mr. LODGE. Objection has been made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection has been made to the request.

Mr. CULBERSON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will be read.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the Journal, and it was approved.

RADIO COMMUNICATION (S. DOC. NO. 888).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $27,880 to carry out the laws enacted concerning radio communication and the international convention upon the subject ratified at the present session of Congress, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 5309) to amend section 3 of the act of Congress approved May 14, 1880 (21 Stat. L., 140), with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled joint resolutions, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

S. J. Res. 122. Joint resolution providing for the payment of the expenses of the Senate in the impeachment trial of Robert W. Archbald; and

S. J. Res. 127. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to supply tents and rations to American citizens compelled to leave Mexico.

PETITION.

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented a petition of Local Lodge No. 349, Brotherhood of Railway Car Men of America, of South Omaha, Nebr., praying for the passage of the so-called injunction limitation bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the bill (S. 7349) for the relief of Sargeant Prentiss Knut, administrator of the estate of Haller Knut, deceased, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims, which was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 19339) granting public lands to the cities of Boulder and Canon City, in the State of Colorado, for public-park purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 992) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 20498) for the relief of certain homesteaders in Nebraska, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 993) thereon.

Mr. TOWNSEND, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 14333) for the relief of John Johnson, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 994) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 7197) for the relief of the heirs of L. A. Davis, submitted an adverse report (No. 995) thereon, which was agreed to and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. ROOT, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 123) authorizing the President of the United States to invite foreign Governments to send representatives to the Fourth International Congress on School Hygiene, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the amendment submitted by himself on December 21, 1911, proposing to appropriate $53,800 to pay the allowances made to the Malambo fire claimants under article 6 of the treaty of November 18, 1903, between the United States and Panama, etc., intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 25970), reported favorably thereon and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed, which was agreed to.

Mr. DILLINGHAM, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to which was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. HEYBURN on the 30th instant, proposing to pay E. C. Talbot $750, Addison T. Smith $500, and J. K. White $150, for services rendered to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, etc., intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 25970), reported favorably thereon and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed, which was agreed to.

LAND AT MAGDALENA BAY, MEXICO, ETC.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report a Senate resolution, together with a brief report from the committee. I ask to have the report and the resolution read. The resolution is a Senate resolution. It will go over under the rule and come up to-morrow at the end of the routine morning business, when I hope it may be disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts submits a report (No. 996) from the Committee on Foreign Relations, with an accompanying resolution (S. Res. 371), which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

On April 2, 1912, the Senate passed a resolution requesting the President, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate any information in the possession of the Government relating to the purchase of land at Magdalena Bay by the Japanese Government or by a Japanese company. On April 30, 1912, the President replied to this resolution of the Senate by transmitting a statement in regard to the subject of inquiry from the Secretary of State.

On the 16th of May, 1912, the Senate passed a second resolution asking for copies of the correspondence relative to the American syndicate interested in lands on Magdalena Bay. On the 23d of May, 1912, the President replied to this resolution by transmitting the correspondence asked for by the Senate.

These messages and the accompanying correspondence were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. After careful consideration of the subject thus referred, the Committee on Foreign Relations reports that it appears from the correspondence and from all the information that the committee has been able to procure that the government of no other country has concerned itself with acquiring, or has made any attempt to acquire, possession of Magdalena Bay and the land about it. It appears, further, however, from the evidence that the corporations or persons who have, or claim to have, title to the lands surrounding Magdalena Bay have made efforts to form a syndicate and to promote the sale of these lands upon the basis of the existence of some national value to a foreign nation in Magdalena Bay as distinct from any commercial value which that bay and the adjoining territory might possess. The fact that such an idea has formed the basis of a negotiation between the possessors of the title to the lands about Magdalena Bay and the citizens, subjects, or corporations of a foreign power seems to the Committee on Foreign Relations to afford an appropriate occasion for an expression of the view of the Senate of the United States regarding this and similar cases. For this reason the committee recommends the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That when any harbor or other place in the American continents is so situated that the occupation thereof for naval or military purposes might threaten the communications or the safety of the United States, the Government of the United States could not see without grave concern the possession of such harbor or other place by any corporation or association which has such a relation to another Government, not American, as to give that Government practical power of control for national purposes."

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I have listened to the report——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will first state the request of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say just a few words.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the resolution may lie over.

Mr. LODGE. It is a Senate resolution. It will go over under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that, being the report of a committee, it would go to the calendar unless otherwise ordered.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that it may lie over under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the resolution may lie over, to be called up to-morrow. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. NELSON. I have listened to the report, Mr. President, and it strikes me that in one respect it is incomplete. I understand, but not from the report, that the company or syndicate that are holding the land around Magdalena Bay are American citizens, our people, not Mexicans. I think the report ought to emphasize that fact, and further let the Senate know who those unpatriotic American citizens are, giving us their names, so that we may find out who are these Americans who are willing to engage in such a scheme as that.

Mr. LODGE. That has all been fully set forth in the correspondence and in the papers already presented to the Senate and referred.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, it ought to be included in the report, that the country may know it.

Mr. LODGE. Of course the resolution is general. The report was made as brief as possible, because the papers were already before the Senate. It is very easy to include that in the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE HUDSON RIVER (S. DOC. NO. 887).

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Printing, I report back favorably, with amendments, Senate resolution 358, submitted by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] on the 15th instant, and I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 300 copies of House Document No. 719, Sixty-first Congress, second session, together with Senate resolution No. 323, Sixty-second Congress, second session, and the response of Hon. Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of War, thereto and inclosures transmitted therewith.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to know what the document is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. Information relative to the attitude and action of the State of New York regarding conditions imposed upon the appropriation under the act of June 25, 1910, for the improvement of the Hudson River.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendments were, in line 1, to strike out "there be printed 300 copies of," and, in line 5, to strike out the words "thereto and inclosures transmitted therewith" and insert the words "relative to the attitude and action of the State of New York regarding conditions imposed upon the appropriation for the improvement of the Hudson River be printed, with accompanying illustrations, as a Senate document."

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That House Document No. 719, Sixty-first Congress, second session, together with Senate resolution 323, Sixty-second Congress, second session, and the response of Hon. Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of War, relative to the attitude and action of the State of New York regarding conditions imposed upon the appropriation for the improvement of the Hudson River be printed, with accompanying illustrations, as a Senate document.

CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, in connection with reports of committees I desire to say that I introduced Senate bill No. 3315, and had it referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections on the 18th of March of this year—more than four months ago. The general purpose of the bill was to enlarge the prohibition against corporations contributing to political campaign funds and to limit the amount that individuals might contribute to such funds. I ask the Senator from Vermont, the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, what the probabilities are of having that bill reported out of the committee in some form or other before the adjournment of Congress?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, in answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Texas I can only say that the bill to which he refers has been twice considered in the committee, and a very wide difference of opinion was developed in respect of its merits. The last time it was taken up it was laid over, and since then I have called two meetings of the committee, but have been unable to get a quorum to act.

Mr. CULBERSON. Well, Mr. President, I have no hesitation in saying to the Senator from Vermont that I regard this bill, especially in view of recent events, of such importance that I shall feel myself compelled, unless the committee acts, to have the Senate act directly upon the bill before adjournment at this session.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Texas that I shall be very glad to call a meeting of the committee on Saturday next, the regular meeting day, and lay the matter before them. I hope that I may then be more successful than I have been in the past in securing a quorum of the committee.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I will wait until I see the result of that attempt to get a quorum of the committee.

LIMIT OF VISITORIAL POWERS.

Mr. McCUMBER. On the 29th instant the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] reported adversely from the Committee on Finance the bill (H. R. 24153) to amend and reenact section 5241 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. At that time I gave notice that I would submit the views of the minority on the bill. I now ask permission to submit the views (Rept. No. 989, p. 2) and ask that they be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

Mr. POMERENE. I introduce a bill, which I ask may be read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The bill (S. 7394) to amend paragraph No. 2 of section 207 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, was read twice by its title.

Mr. POMERENE. I suggested that the bill be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, but on second thought it occurs to me that it probably should go to the Judiciary Committee, in view of the fact that the purpose of the bill is to give to shippers the same right to appeal from and to have reviewed decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission now enjoyed by the common carriers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 7395) for the relief of Frank D. Courtade; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. HITCHCOCK:

A bill (S. 7396) to subject lands of former Fort Niobrara Military Reservation and other lands to homestead entry; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. KENYON:

A bill (S. 7397) granting an increase of pension to Louisa J. Jackson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Maine:

A bill (S. 7398) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Gannon (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GRONNA:

A bill (S. 7399) granting a pension to William F. Niederriter (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 7400) for the relief of the American Fire Insurance Co., of Philadelphia, Pa., and another (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Finance.

AMENDMENTS TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL (H. R. 25970).

Mr. CRAWFORD submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $540 to pay Harry B. Straight for extra clerical services in connection with the preparation of the omnibus claims bill, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia submitted an amendment relative to the salaries of commissioned medical officers of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $120,000 for payment to the treasurer of the Mount Vernon Avenue Association, the assignee of the State of Virginia, and $72,000 to the State of Maryland, being the sums advanced by the States of Virginia and Maryland in 1790 and 1791, respectively, to the United States, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

COAL LANDS IN ALASKA.

Mr. JONES submitted four amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 7030) to provide for a permanent supply of coal for the use of the United States Navy and other governmental purposes, to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

LIMIT OF VISITORIAL POWERS.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 24153) to amend and reenact section 5241 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—J. A. FUNK.

On motion of Mr. GUGGENHEIM, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying S. 3996, Sixty-second Congress, second session, granting an increase of pension to J. A. Funk, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

CORBETT TUNNEL, WYOMING—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is closed.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask that Senate bill 4862 and the President's veto thereof be now laid before the Senate for consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate resumed consideration of the bill (S. 4862) for the relief of certain persons having supplied labor and materials for the prosecution of the work of constructing the Corbett Tunnel of the Shoshone irrigation project, returned by the President of the United States with his objections thereto.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a very few minutes in the discussion of this measure. The refusal of the President to give his approval to the bill is cruel, in its consequences, beyond expression, and I believe it to be a flagrant misuse of the veto power. The bill as passed by Congress does not concern any policy. No matter what its merits may be, its utmost effect is to put upon 118,000 or 128,000 acres of land which have not yet been sold, which have not yet been offered to the public for sale, an additional burden of about 33 cents per acre.

I do not understand that the veto power given by our Constitution to the President ought to be used in order to overthrow the will of Congress in respect to such a measure. I do not believe that the veto power in a free country is intended to authorize the Executive to veto every measure which he would have opposed had he been a member of the legislative tribunal which passed it. If that is to be the rule upon which the veto power is exercised, I venture the prediction that it will not be long continued in the hands of executives anywhere. The veto power is a most valuable power when properly exercised; it is a worthy part of our system of government; but it is only intended that the Executive shall overthrow the will of the legislative branch of the Government when we transgress our contitutional power or when some great policy which is vital to the welfare and the interests of the country is involved. It can not be true that the Executive, either of a State or of the Nation, may interpose his veto simply because he believes that the legislation is undesirable and simply because he believes that had he been a member of the legislative branch of the Government he would not have given his assent to it.

We have here the simplest and plainest exercise of legislative power and discretion. We have here a bill which not only does not relate to any great policy, which does not involve our constitutional authority to legislate, but which is insignificant from the national standpoint in its consequences and trivial in its amount viewed from the standpoint of national proportions. I think we ought to pass this bill notwithstanding the veto of the President simply, if for no other reason, because Congress has determined that it shall become a law, and because it is not one of the cases in which a President ought to interpose his veto.

Accepting the reasons which he himself gives for the refusal to accord the bill his approval, I regard them as utterly inadequate to warrant any Executive in overriding the act of the legislative department of the Government.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I understand the Senator to say that the veto power ought to be reserved for great questions, and not questions of the character involved in this bill. As I understand, the alternative of the veto is the approval of a bill. Does the Senator think the President ought to approve a bill which he, in fact, does not approve?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do; most emphatically.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not.

Mr. ROOT. May I ask the Senator from Iowa on what he bases this, to me extraordinary, proposition? Does he base it upon anything but his own unsupported judgment as to what the veto power ought to be?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. ROOT. Does he base it upon anything in the history of the exercise of that power?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. ROOT. I should like to know what it is.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do. I base it upon the almost universal history of the exercise of that power. Never before have I seen it exercised upon such a subject matter. I may say that I was given this power for a period of something like seven years under the constitution of my State. It is given to the executive of that State in substantially the same terms that it is given to the President of the United States. I think the Senator from New York will find there is much literature concerning the power of veto and that it is substantially in its conclusions as I have stated. I never before heard it asserted that it was the duty of the Executive to veto every bill that did not meet with his approval as an original proposition. I have always supposed that while the power is given in unlimited terms—no one questions the President's power to exercise it upon every bill or for any reason—that in a free Government like ours it was intended as a check upon the legislative branch of the Government, only to be used on occasions of some gravity where clearly the legislative will had been improvidently exercised. If, on the other hand, as I said before, it is to be used in every case in which the Executive would have voted against the measure had he been a member of the legislative department of the Government, consequences must necessarily ensue which, in my opinion, will destroy the veto power in those cases where it can be exercised for the high welfare of the people of this country.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, no one can say what he may or may not find in the future, and the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa that he thinks the "Senator from New York" will find that the history of the exercise of the veto power conforms to the view of the Senator from Iowa, of course, is not impossible. I can only say that up to this time I have found nothing, either from reading or from experience or from observation of the Government of the United States, which affords any warrant whatever for the view taken by the Senator from Iowa.

The most conspicuous illustration of the veto power probably that we have had is to be found in the numerous and repeated vetoes by Mr. Cleveland of private pension bills, separate and relatively insignificant measures. I am sure that I have known within my own experience of scores of vetoes by Presidents of the United States of bills no more important than this. It is so important a part of the veto power that in a considerable number of our States the power has been extended by the constitutions thereof to permit the governors of the States to veto items in appropriation bills, so that the power of veto can not be evaded by the legislature by putting just such provisions as in substance this bill contains into an appropriation bill and thereby preventing the veto because of the necessity of having the appropriation bill become a law.

Small and apparently insignificant acts by the legislature may be the beginning of most injurious practices, and it seems to me that if the President finds that the legislature is embarking upon a course of conduct which, according to his judgment, would be injurious, he can not reconcile it to his conscience to approve a bill which may be the first step in such a course of conduct.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from New York has just suggested that the smallest item upon an appropriation bill may be the beginning of most injurious practices. I wish to ask him in that connection if he does not think, taking the history of the English-speaking people by and large, that they have been the beginning of all beneficial courses, and whether the power to coerce the Executive by placing measures upon appropriation bills has not been the most valuable instrument the people ever had in their power to exercise?

Mr. ROOT. That is an entirely different subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand it is different from the main subject, but it is relevant here.

Mr. ROOT. What I was calling attention to is the fact that the veto power is so clearly understood to apply to measures that may be insignificant in themselves that in some of our States, I think in many of our States, it has been expressly extended to items in appropriation bills.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In that I agree with the Senator, and the Confederate constitutional convention granted that power to the President upon the theory that the Senator is following out, and made a great mistake, in my opinion, because they lost thereby the coercive power of the legislative over the executive which must exist in a free government.

Mr. ROOT. May I say one word?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from New York further.

Mr. ROOT. I do not think the rule which the President should apply in determining whether he shall approve or disapprove of a measure is the rule the Senator from Iowa has mentioned; that is, whether or not the President would have voted for or against the bill. But I do think that when a bill goes to him from the Congress which he does not approve, which he thinks would be injurious, which he thinks ought not to become a law, it is his duty to disapprove it.

Mr. ROOT subsequently said: I ask that an extract from a message of President Cleveland, dated June 6, 1896, in relation to the exercise of the veto power, may be put into the RECORD at the close of my remarks upon this subject delivered a few minutes ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 6, 1896.

To the House of Representatives:

I hereby return without my approval House bill No. 8293, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes."

To the extent that the Constitution has devolved upon the President a participation in legislation, I suppose his action on bills presented to him for approval involves a duty to be performed, like others pertaining to his office, with care and circumspection and in full view of his responsibility to the people and his obligation to subserve the public welfare. It is difficult to understand why, under the Constitution, it should be necessary to submit proposed legislation to Executive scrutiny and approval, except to invoke the exercise of Executive judgment and invite independent Executive action.

The unpleasant incidents which accompany the use of the veto power would tempt its avoidance, if such a course did not involve an abandonment of constitutional duty and an assent to legislation for which the Executive is not willing to share the responsibility.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I did not intend to enter into the history of the exercise of this power by former Presidents in special instances; it would be as fruitless as it would be immaterial. I, however, do not agree at all with the view that seems to be taken by the Senator from New York. I do agree that the Executive himself must determine what his duty is with respect to the matter before him. There are no limitations upon his power. My assertion is that in exercising that power he should be careful to limit it in its exercise to those cases which do, in his opinion, gravely imperil the public interest and seriously injure the public welfare.

It has been disputed from the beginning of this Government that the Chief Executive should be the equivalent of the difference between one-half and one-third of the legislative branch of the Government. The President does not hear the arguments upon the measure. There is no opportunity for him to become advised with respect to all that is to be said for or against the measure, and therefore, unless he clearly perceives that Congress is passing beyond its constitutional authority or unless he clearly perceives that it is embarking upon a course that will be perilous and menacing to the public welfare, he ought to accept the will of the legislative department of the Government and not interpose his veto.

I did not intend, however, to make this suggestion a prominent part of the argument I wished to submit. It is incidental purely. I remarked upon it because I had never before observed an instance that so little warranted executive interference as the one before us; and now I ask the attention of the Senate for a very few moments to the merits of the bill itself.

I confess to a very great interest in it. It passes a little beyond that. I confess to a very great feeling with respect to the matter. One of the chief losers through the unfortunate failure of the contractor and one of the chief beneficiaries of this bill is a woman, who is fighting bravely and courageously and persistently for her home and for her children. The story of it all is one of the most pathetic I have ever heard, and when I heard it I became interested in it, and I studied the bill, because this woman spent her girlhood days in my own State, and her old father, who still lives there, is one of our most estimable citizens.

This was my introduction to the subject, and I have examined the whole transaction with as much care as I ever bestowed upon anything that was to come before the Senate. I did it because this woman, who is trying hard to educate her little girl, was about to lose her home, having mortgaged it in order to carry forward her work, and if she does not now receive the favorable consideration of the Senate she will lose her home, and all that she has courageously accumulated will have been taken away from her, and she will be left helpless in this battle against tremendous odds. I therefore did give the subject the most careful study, and I know all there is to know about it. I know about the hearings which were had, hearings of considerable length, before the two committees, one in the Senate and one in the House.

The truth is that whoever occupies these acres of land that are to be reclaimed through the project, which used the material and used the supplies and used the money that these poor people furnished to the contractors and to the laborers—whoever uses this land will be benefited by every penny that has been contributed by these people in order that the project might be completed. There is no claim whatever in all this record that the cost of the completion of this project is more than a fair cost, including the sums that have not been paid. The hearing is full of proof that the contractors were mistaken respecting the character of the work, and I do not say that the officials of the United States led them into a mistake intentionally. I do not say that. I only say the contractors undertook the work under a misapprehension in regard to the character of the material in which and through which the work was to be done, and, therefore, as they proceeded they found the cost of doing it was greater than the amount the Government had agreed to pay them for it. This was the reason they could not pay their men and could not pay for all of the material and could not pay for the supplies necessary to carry on the work, and therefore these claims which are presented in this measure.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. There has not been a session of Congress since I have been here, being on the Committee on Claims, that Congress has not reimbursed every contractor who has taken a contract under the Government estimates and has found the conditions different from those stated in the estimates or specifications. Here at this session we paid one contractor some $29,000 because of loss occasioned by reason of errors in the specifications as to the character of the material to be taken out.

Mr. CUMMINS. Those facts are not disputed, and therefore I am led to inquire for a moment into the merits of the case. What are the merits of these claimants? I do not pretend that they have any legal claim against the Government. We all admit that they have none. They are here challenging the sense of justice of their Government. The first thing that I instance as indicating the merit of the case is that the Government has received the benefit of every penny represented in these claims. The land there now ready to take the water from the project could not have had the water without the payment of this money, without the advancement of these supplies and materials. Therefore it seems to me we ought to be willing under all the circumstances to reimburse these people.

The second ground of merit is this: These people did not know that the law was changed in February, 1905. For 12 years the law had been that the persons who furnished material or supplies or labor for a project like this were entitled to sue upon the bond taken by the Government from the contractor or contractors, and they in that way had the very same security that the universal policy of the States gives by way of mechanic's liens to material men and to laboring men. The policy of the law of 1894 was in exact accord with the enlightened and the civilized and the wise policy of the States that gives a lien upon the property to the people who can not protect themselves, whose labor or whose supplies or material enhance in value the property upon which they are used in improvements.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from Iowa says the Government has received the benefit of the money expended in this way. Does the Senator know how much of this land is actually Government land and under this project?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not remember; nearly all of it.

Mr. WORKS. I agree thoroughly with the Senator from Iowa that the Government should be held responsible. That is not the question in my mind at all. The question is whether that burden should be carried on to the settlers, and that is a matter which I think should direct itself to the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I answer it now in this way: If the Senator from California—and there are other Senators here who take the same view—feels that it ought not to be passed on to the land—not the settlers; there are no settlers there; there may be settlers there in the future, but there are none there now on these lands of which I am speaking—but if the Senator from California and the Senator from South Dakota and others who, taking that view of it—I am not criticizing that view of it—feel that it ought not to be placed upon these lands as an additional burden, then let us pass this bill, so that these people can have their money and be saved from the ruin which stares them in the face, a ruin which is imminent and which can not long be delayed, and then pass a bill which shall provide that these sums of money shall not be put upon these lands.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question, because I heard a statement he made yesterday which, if true, would certainly induce me to vote to pass this bill over the President's veto. I understood the Senator from Iowa to state that there are 118,000 acres of this land which have not yet been settled upon.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did so state at one time. I made a mistake in that respect. There are, in fact, 128,000 acres of land that have not been settled upon.

Mr. SWANSON. And the effect of this bill would be to put this burden on that land which has not yet been occupied by settlers?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true.

Mr. SWANSON. And the present settlers would not have to pay any part of it?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; it would put a burden of 33 cents an acre, in round figures, payable in 10 years, which means 3 cents an acre per year upon land yet unsold and unentered.

Mr. SWANSON. And it is optional with future settlers whether they will take the land with that additional burden of 3 cents an acre per annum or not?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, yes. The land is part of the public domain. The Government can sell it at any price it sees fit.

Mr. SWANSON. There is no question that this money was spent to benefit that land?

Mr. CUMMINS. None whatever.

Mr. SWANSON. It is not any additional burden put upon the settlers who have already taken land there?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not a penny.

Mr. SWANSON. I can not see how any gentleman can object to the passage of this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was remarking that one of the merits which can very well be brought forward by the beneficiaries of the bill is that they did not know the law had been changed. I think the law never ought to have been changed. In harmony with the policy which prevails everywhere, I think the laboring men and material men should have a preference, so that they could be paid. If that be not so, I venture the prediction that no contractors save those of immense credit will ever be able to carry on any work of this character. One of the things that the mechanics' lien law does is to allow contractors who have no large established credit or no great property to compete with others for the construction of work of this kind. But that is neither here nor there.

It may be a wise policy, although I dispute it; but the truth is that these people knew nothing whatever about it. They knew no more about it than did the First National Bank in South Dakota and they went forward and trusted these contractors, believing that they were trusting the Government of the United States, believing that whatever might happen to the contractors they would be abundantly protected in the bond that had been given by the contractor for the faithful performance of his contract.

We all know that there is a maxim which is expressed most frequently in Latin that is rarely heard in English. It runs something like this: "Ignorantia legis neminem excusat." But these people had never heard that maxim. They were trusting to a general policy which had been established by the Government under which a vast amount of work had been done.

Are you going to judge them by all the rigors of the old maxim that ignorance of the law excuseth no man? It is a hard doctrine. It is remorseless. It is unjust to invoke it against these people. This Senate does too many generous, charitable, and humane things to refuse to now recognize the equities of these unfortunates who have contributed something to the value of the property of the Government of the United States.

I recognize that there is a difference between the South Dakota case, the Bellefourche case, and this one. There are no two cases exactly alike. In that case the proposal was issued before the repeal of the law of 1894, and the contract was made afterwards. In this case the proposal was made a short while after the repeal of the law, and of course the contract was made after its repeal. But essentially there is no difference between the two cases. Abandoning all legal distinctions and technicalities and niceties, in equity and in good conscience, in fairness and decency and justice, there is no difference between the two cases.

Why? Because in the South Dakota case the equity of the bank was that they did not know that the law had been changed so that it could not rely upon the bond. It did not know; I grant that. In this case these people did not know that the law had been changed so that they could not have recourse upon the bond.

If there is to be any discrimination in the application of the harsh legal maxim that ignorance of the law excuses nobody, it ought to be in favor of these people out in Montana and Wyoming, because they had less opportunity to acquire the knowledge and be guided by the information than had the bank in South Dakota.

We are not discussing this case upon rigid legal principles. We are appealing to the sense of right and justice that ought to prevail and that I think does prevail in the hearts of all Senators; and in that forum there is no difference whatever between the South Dakota case and the Montana case.

I qualify my last sentence; there is just this difference: The bank in South Dakota could have survived the loss. These people can not survive the loss. While the law, blind as it is to conditions of men in administering justice, would make no difference between the poor woman, the tradesman, and the laboring man of Montana and the bank of South Dakota, this Senate will make a difference between them, for I know that it would rather give relief to these people who sorely need it than to give relief to an institution that could bear the loss without sensible injury to itself.

I am not bringing these two cases up for the purpose of suggesting that having given relief to the bank we ought now to give it to these people. I am bringing it up to appeal to a sentiment which I know exists here that these people ought to have relief, even though it had been denied to the bank in South Dakota.

I reject any suggestion or any idea that there are any other influences which prevail in this Chamber or any other motives governing the conduct of Senators than a pure desire to render to the people of the country that justice, that protection, that safety, that help, which alone will make our Government the object of the affection of all its own citizens and at the same time make it the admiration of the whole world for the quality of the justice it administers.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Shoshone project has cost about $4,200,000. The Corbett Tunnell, upon which this work was done, and to which these materials were furnished, has cost approximately $1,000,000. Certain persons furnished labor and materials to the contractors of the Corbett Tunnel to the extent of $42,000, and that labor and that material has not been paid for, although it has entered into and formed a part, and a necessary part, of the subsidiary enterprise costing a million dollars, and the entire enterprise costing $4,000,000.

The question is whether the men who furnished this labor and material should go unpaid or whether they should be paid and the payment be added to the general cost of the enterprise and distributed over 128,000 acres yet to be settled upon, at a cost of about 33 cents an acre, to be paid for in 10 annual installments at the rate of 3 cents per acre per annum.

The President, acting under the advice of the Secretary of the Interior, has vetoed this bill, which met the judgment of the majority of the Senate and the House, upon the ground that it is retroactive, and also upon the ground that it shifts the burden from the men who furnished the labor and the material to the future settlers upon these lands.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to ask the Senator what he understands the President to mean by retroactive. I have been unable to discover in what respect it would be retroactive, and I ask the Senator if he has an opinion with regard to that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I had thought of that. I can not regard this legislation as retroactive in any objectionable sense. It certainly does not impair the obligation of any contract or destroy any property rights. But I am not inclined to indulge in criticism regarding the President's message or the President's views.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me, I do not wish to speak at length, I have only a few views to present, and I wish to present them briefly, and I would prefer not to be drawn into a discussion of side issues.

I propose to discuss this question upon the broad principles of equitable consideration. I do not question the good motives that prompted the Secretary of the Interior and the President in calling the attention of Congress to the salient features of this legislation, and to the fact, which we must all admit, that this legislation does shift the burden from the men who furnished the labor and the work to future settlers not yet in existence, who have the option of settling upon this 128,000 acres of land or not as they choose.

I agree with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] that an enlightened legislation demands that the man who furnishes labor and material should have a lien upon the property or work into which his labor and material enter. That is the first obligation which civilized society should recognize as attached to property. Civilized society has recognized it in every State in the Union. These laws are now a part of the enlightened legislation of the day.

The Government of the United States, following this example in 1894, passed an act, not giving the labor and material men a lien upon the Government's property but giving them a lien upon the contractor's bond. Later on, in 1905, Congress repealed that act. I regard that as one of the most reactionary pieces of legislation that has been indulged in by Congress. It was an absolute step backward in enlightened legislation, and, so far as I am concerned, in the consideration of the equitable rights of these parties, I am disposed to brush it entirely aside and to recognize the obligation of the Government and the obligation of this property to respond to the men who honestly put labor upon it or furnished materials to it as the prior obligation of the entire enterprise. So I propose by my vote to sustain the action of Congress as against the veto of the President.

CRITICISMS OF RECLAMATION SERVICE.

Mr. President, during this debate I regret that Members from the West have taken occasion to cast slurs upon the Reclamation Service, or, if that is too harsh a term, to indulge in expressions that indicated a doubt of the capacity of that service and the excellence of its work. Some Senators made reference to extravagance and recklessness.

Now, this is a western enterprise embracing 15 States in the arid and semiarid region. At the solicitation of those States the Nation generously turned over the receipts from the sales of public lands into a fund dedicated to the reclamation of the West for all time, a revolving fund, which, through a process of compensation by future settlers, would enable ultimately the reclamation of every acre of land in the West capable of reclamation, without ultimate loss to the Govenment.

WORK HAS STOOD THE TEST OF INVESTIGATION.

That work was undertaken under large powers by the Reclamation Service, a Reclamation Service whose work has stood the test of time and whose work has the general approval of the West. It has stood the test of investigation after investigation. The Carter committee, composed of Members of the Senate, made an investigation some few years ago, and whilst a few minor criticisms were indulged, the general scope and the general efficiency of this great service was approved. I quote from the report, as follows:

> The committee found in the engineers and employees of the Reclamation Service a high-grade, courteous, and intelligent body of men, earnestly devoted to the work in hand * * * and that this work in hand is of vast and enduring national importance and must always be considered from the national rather than from the local point of view. The whole country is profoundly interested in the establishment of permanent homes by thrifty people on the public domain and the consequent development of the productive capacity of the soil. The reclamation policy inaugurated by the act of June 17, 1902, should be faithfully sustained until every acre of arable public land within the arid and semiarid regions of our country for which a water supply can be made available at reasonable cost is furnished with an adequate supply of water for irrigation.

I refer also to Senate Report No. 1281, Sixty-first Congress, third session, a volume of over 900 pages in which has been included replies sent in response to circular letters to all persons interested, inviting them to suggest or criticize the law and the operations under it.

Later on, when it was proposed to loan the fund $20,000,000, to be repaid later on out of these proceeds, a commission of engineers was selected, five in number, who made a critical examination of every enterprise and who presented to the President of the United States an approving report. This report was transmitted to Congress by the President on January 5, 1911. This board of fair-minded, experienced Army engineers visited every project, examined all of the principal works, met with the settlers, and in their report give commendation to the work as a whole, recommending its continuation. The board states it "was impressed with the ability of the employees occupying positions of responsibility," and comments upon each and every piece of important work ending with recommendations in line with the policy then being pursued.

I ask whence is it that these slurring allusions come? From what source? They come from those settlers who without fault of the Government have been subjected to great hardships and from other settlers upon these great projects, few in number, I believe, who are desirous of escaping the obligations of the contract with the Government. It is the old case of encouraging the expenditure of money and then when the time of payment comes demurring to repayment, and a ground of demurrer must be laid in criticism of the work, charges of extravagance, and inefficiency, by which the burdens of the settlers have been increased. We find in almost every community a small number, and I will say for the credit of American citizenship a very small proportion of men, who make these complaints and impose upon public men who represent these constituencies, and who hear little or nothing from the men who are satisfied, but who hear much from the men who are dissatisfied. In this I am not including the man who after earnest effort has for a time not succeeded and who seeks for extension of the period of repayment, intending to make these payments when his means will permit. His efforts should be met with generous and appreciative assistance proportional to the good intentions and energy he has displayed.

It has been said that the cost of this enterprise has been vastly swollen since 1902, when this work was inaugurated. That is true, but the charge that it is the result of recklessness and inefficiency is not correct. We all know that the cost of labor and material has prodigiously increased during the past 10 years, so much so that some of the contractors upon these great works have been unable to make money, and some have even lost money, the accumulation of years. It can not be contended for a moment that these projects have cost, judged by the prevailing standards of the cost of labor and material, more than they should have cost. They have simply cost more than the estimates of 10 years ago, when the standard prices for labor and material were lower than they are to-day.

SALT RIVER PROJECT.

We have an illustration of this unintentional misrepresentation regarding the existing conditions in the statement that was made yesterday regarding the Salt River project in Arizona, which it is claimed involved in the first instance an estimate of only three and a half million dollars, and which has swollen to over $10,000,000. I can recall when that enterprise was inaugurated that many objected to it because there was so small an area of public land included within the enterprise, most of that land having been taken up by settlers prior to the inauguration of the enterprise by the Government. The settlers had entered there in good faith; they had constructed their irrigation ditches and their dams. They found that their dams were being swept away season after season; they were upon the verge of destruction; and they urged upon the National Government that it was its first duty to save an existing community rather than to create a new community, although in the latter it might have a larger area of unsettled public lands. The Reclamation Service, responding to the demands of humanity and wise public policy, made that the first project under the reclamation act. Certainly, the settlers in that valley have no reason to complain either of the Reclamation Service or the Government.

It is true that the enterprise at first contemplated only the construction of the Roosevelt Dam and certain works connected with it, at a cost of about three and a half or four million dollars; and I have to say that that dam has been constructed and completed pretty well within the estimates, for the Government diminished the cost by setting up a factory there and making its own cement instead of buying it at extravagant prices elsewhere. But the work did not cease there. After that work was inaugurated the headworks, upon which the irrigation system below depended, were destroyed and the settlers were unable to go on with the expenditures necessary for repairs. They were again threatened with destruction. They sent committees to Washington to the Reclamation Service and urged as their only salvation that the Government should take up the distribution system, the construction of diverting dams, and a system of distributing canals, which was not contemplated in the original plan. This involved the construction of permanent structures, not merely temporary structures such as had been put up by the rude work of the settlers. The taking over of that work and its completion by the Government cost $3,000,000 more.

Then, in connection with the headworks and distributing system, there were certain works furnishing power. Among these was the predecessor of the Pacific Gas & Electric Co., of Phoenix, Ariz. I am told that the idea has been to utilize the fall of water in the development of the water power, and thus make the water power partially compensatory of the enterprise. So the Reclamation Service found itself with this power plant on hand. The question was how to utilize this power without interfering with existing vested rights or preventing development of the irrigated area.

The desire of the settlers in the valley was that the Reclamation Service should utilize it as an asset belonging to the enterprise, which ultimately, under the reclamation act, would fall into the hands of the water users' association after they had paid back to the Government its expenditures by a process of installments running over a period of 10 years. Every step in this process has been approved by the water users' association, a corporation composed entirely of the water users themselves, the settlers themselves, and approved by their directors. Every extension was undertaken at their urgent request and demand. So about $3,000,000 more was spent in water-power development, and thus the total expenditures aggregated about $10,000,000, about one-third being spent for the original enterprise—the Roosevelt Storage Dam—and one-third being spent for the distributing system, and one-third for the power system partly used for pumping for irrigation and partly in the general market for light and power. Thus this community of settlers has acquired as its own property the most perfect system of public utilities in the country, free entirely from monopolistic control.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. Does the Senator know what amount per acre the settlers are going to be required to pay on account of the expenditures on that particular project?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that it is estimated that the project will irrigate about 240,000 acres, which prior to the enterprise were worth fifteen or twenty dollars an acre, and that the cost of the entire enterprise, $10,000,000, distributed over the entire acreage, will be about $50 per acre, which will be paid back in 10 annual installments. But the present value of the land is said to range from $150 per acre upward.

Mr. WORKS. Does the Senator know how much of that property to be benefited by the project was in private ownership and not Government land at all?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Oh, a very large proportion of it.

Mr. WORKS. I want to ask the Senator further, as affecting the whole question of the Reclamation Service, whether he thinks the requirement of law that the money shall be repaid within 10 years is a reasonable one, under all the circumstances, or whether the time ought not to be extended?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, Mr. President, that is a matter that is pending before the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands. My inclination is to a reasonable extension where the necessity of it can be shown. There are many of these enterprises, however, on which the settlers will be entirely able to pay within the next 10 years, and it is desirable that they should do so, because if there is delay in the payments, it delays, to that extent, the inauguration of other enterprises, so that you are really, by making an extension to-day, delaying an enterprise of the future.

Mr. WORKS. I desire, of course, as a western man, to see the Reclamation Service self-sustaining, and I think Congress should make every endeavor to bring about that result; but I have always believed, and I now believe, that the length of time allowed for repayment, in view of the large sums of money which it is necessary to expend in the construction of irrigation projects, was altogether too short. It has resulted in a great deal of discontent, as the Senator knows; and that discontent is not wholly unfounded by any means, because there have been great hardships resulting from the burdens that have been placed on the settlers under the irrigation reservoirs.

SETTLERS HAVE ENDURED HARDSHIPS.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I would not minimize, of course, the hardships of the settlers; many of them have had to endure great hardships, and it is our duty not to add to them or perpetuate them. The hardships have not been due to the action of the Reclamation Service. They have been due to the fact that Congress, when the reclamation bill was up, passed, against my individual protest and the protest of the present officials of the Reclamation Service, an amendment opening up to immediate entry the lands which were subject to the enterprise. The result was that such entries being under the homestead act which required actual residence, the entrymen had to live on arid lands, which were utterly incapable of producing anything for months and years until the enterprise was entirely finished. That this compulsory residence was, in many instances, a great hardship can not be denied. At last the Reclamation Service induced Congress to permit the withdrawal of the lands from entry in the later projects until the completion of the project and the supply of water was assured, but most of the harm was already done.

Mr. WORKS. I did not mean to intimate by what I said that this result had come about by the extravagance or mismanagement of the Reclamation Service.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Oh, no.

Mr. WORKS. I myself have passed no criticism upon the Reclamation Service, and I hope the Senator did not refer to me as one of the western Senators who had taken any such ground as that. My question was founded upon the necessary expense of constructing the reservoirs and distributing systems, not upon the fact that there had been any extravagance connected with the work.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understood the Senator perfectly, and I wish to say that it is not my purpose to indulge in criticism of the utterances of any Senator upon this floor. I have no doubt that the Senators have acted upon information which has come to them and which they thought it proper to present to the consideration of the Senate; but as an opportunity to explain these matters has presented itself, I thought it incumbent upon me to explain them.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I think it unfortunate that the question of the Roosevelt Dam should now be brought up before the Senate in connection with the discussion of the veto message of the President on a very different question. I can not sit quietly and permit the inference to go out that the complaints which have been made are merely carping complaints of men who have no right to be heard and no right to any sort of remedy. If it is the desire of the Senator to protect and defend the Reclamation Service at all hazards at all times, I suggest that he defer the Arizona reclamation question until it shall finally come up for appropriate discussion. I shall then, I hope, find myself heartily agreeing in many respects with the Senator from Nevada, but as to the construction of many of the irrigation projects, and as to the management of many of them, I do not wish by sitting silent to be considered as estopped from making proper criticism at the appropriate time, if criticism be justified. But I protest that this is not the time nor the occasion to debate the question, for the reason that the matter is not before the Senate in any form.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, as I have stated, it is not my purpose to enter into a criticism of any Senator's utterance upon this subject, but the fact is that an erroneous impression has been given, according to my judgment, and it is my purpose to correct it.

I agree with the Senator from Arizona that it is unfortunate that the question of the Roosevelt Dam, and of the various minor details of sale of power and other involved technical matters, have been brought before the Senate in the discussion of the veto message of the President on a very different question, but this has been done. We of the West, who are familiar with these matters, do not always appreciate what is the effect on others of bringing these details into various discussions.

The reclamation act, as it is now on the statute books, was the result of a long struggle in which the West was successful only after it had settled its own differences and agreed upon a policy. We have by no means settled all the problems of the West by the passage of the act. It is now being put into effect. We need still further legislation and further united activity in order to bring about the ultimate development of the resources of the country. If, among ourselves, we can not agree upon the course to be pursued, how can others join with us in this great and patriotic work?

WEST MUST UNITE IN SUPPORT OF SERVICE.

What I am trying to develop is that in unity is strength on these questions, and that by bringing to public attention continually in a critical spirit these matters which are relatively of minor importance we are retarding the settlement of the great problems before us. The desirable settler whom we all wish to come to the West learns in a vague sort of way that there is dissatisfaction. He does not know how and can not study into the matter, but he sees a general reference or minor complaint and at once concludes that something must be wrong, so he drops the idea of going to the West to seek a home. The capitalist, especially the man of small means, who desires to put his hard-earned savings into profitable investment, is deterred because he hears these rumors and concludes that if the Government can not carry out its work effectively, therefore no one can do so. The settler who is already on the ground and who should be making every effort to respond to his installment payments and to build up the credit of himself and the country is prevented from so doing by the intangible rumors which he can not exactly locate, but which cause a vague feeling of unrest. I am referring to these matters, as before stated, not because I wish to do so, but because it is incumbent upon some one to call to the attention of all interested the fact that we should either investigate carefully and set at rest these matters or else abstain from comments which cast doubt upon the reclamation act and its operations.

The subject of the Arizona project has been brought up by others. Taking this as an example the criticism has been made that in developing the water-power plant in connection with that project an exclusive contract was given in the sale of a small part of it to the Pacific Gas & Electric Co., of Phoenix, for that power at 1½ cents per kilowatt hour, while it charged the public 12 cents per kilowatt hour, and it is stated that protests were made against that contract.

My information is that prior to the Government undertaking the construction of this water-power plant, the owners of the existing canal were under contract with the predecessors in interest of Pacific Gas & Electric Co. to furnish its power at one-half cent per kilowatt hour, one-third of the price subsequently exacted by the Reclamation Service, and that the Reclamation Service in substituting the new contract for the old one, the obligation of which still remained, limited its operation to 10 years, so that at the end of that time any inequalities could be corrected. I may say in passing that it is not the duty of the National Government to prescribe to a contracting corporation which is getting power from its works the price it shall charge to consumers. That is the duty of the local regulating power, and fortunately there exists in Arizona a body created by the law of that State with power over public utilities, and if that public utility is charging the public too much the matter can be corrected by the action of the State authorities.

It appears from the evidence submitted that this revised contract, which has been in existence five years, and which will soon run out, has existed for many years without comment, excepting as being a fortunate solution of an exceedingly difficult complication. It is undoubtedly a matter upon which men's opinions may vary according to the degree of knowledge of the preexisting conditions, especially those which the contract rectifies. Compared with the great power development and especially of the project as a whole the transaction is relatively insignificant.

Mr. President, it must be recollected that in making this contract the Reclamation Service was substituting a new contract for an old one. It substituted, if my recollection is right, a 10-year contract for a 25-year contract; it substituted a higher price for a lower price, and beyond that the contract which was entered into has been approved by the water users' association, composed of all the settlers themselves, after full publicity and investigation. I have before me the statement of the counsel of the water users' association, presenting in parallel columns the provisions of the old contract and the provisions of the new, and giving it as his opinion that the new contract of June 22, 1907, was more favorable to the people of that locality than the old contract was. This is as follows:

CONCLUSIONS OF THE ATTORNEY FOR THE WATER USERS' ASSOCIATION.

For the purpose of the comparison by you of the terms of these two contracts, that between the Arizona Water Co. and the Phoenix Light & Fuel Co., and that between the Government and the Pacific Gas & Electric Co., so far as that may be readily done, I collate the following provisions:

I speak of the contract of March 1, 1901, as the "old contract," and the one of June 22, 1907, between the Government and the Pacific Gas & Electric Co., as the "new contract."

By the old contract the term of the right was 25 years from its date, a little more than 6 years of which had expired at the date of the new contract.

By the old contract the right was to the exclusive use of all the water power obtainable from water diverted by the Arizona Water Co.

Under the old contract the Electric Co. had a right to the flow of all the water diverted by the Arizona Canal for the development of power.

Under the old contract the exclusive right extended to any person in or out of Phoenix and to any use whatever.

By the new contract the term of the right is 10 years, to date from the time the Government can begin to supply power under its provisions.

By the new contract the right is limited to a maximum delivery of 1,500 kilowatts of energy, being a little more than a third of that contemplated by the old contract to be immediately utilized, and a probability of much more as need for it arose.

Under the new contract the Electric Co. has no right to the flow of any of the water nor any right to interfere with it or its manner of diversion or course of distribution whatever.

In the new contract the right excludes only the general retailing of power to customers in Phoenix or furnishing it to anyone in Phoenix to be again sold or retained. There is no limitation beyond that upon the sale of power contained in the new contract.

It should be noted that the subject of the old contract was the right to the use of water to develop power for the purpose of estimating the price to be paid for it. It was to be reckoned in kilowatts of electrical energy. The subject matter of the new contract is electric power or energy, which is measured in kilowatts.

By the old contract the price to be paid when the development exceeded the amount of $7,500 paid for royalty was $4.50 per 1,000 kilowatt-hours.

By the new contract the price is to be $15 per 1,000 kilowatt-hours.

I have, as you will note, treated the subject solely from the standpoint of the association in its relation to the project in general.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. By anticipating questions that will ultimately be debated the Senator is entering into a discussion which is somewhat embarrassing to me. He is now referring to a contract with which I am perfectly familiar and which will ultimately come up legitimately some day for discussion. I can not sit silent and admit by my presence that there is no just ground of complaint in connection with the matters to which he is referring, and, inasmuch as another and entirely different question is before the Senate, I think the Senator ought not, at least at this time, in the case of a project in my own State, in which my own people are interested, foreclose me from the opportunity of answering him, which I can not now do by reason of the proprieties of the occasion as I see them.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am certainly not seeking to foreclose the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am not criticizing the Senator in the least, but I am simply expressing the hope that my silence and that of my colleague in matters affecting the State of Arizona with which we are perfectly familiar may not be misconstrued. If the matter were properly under consideration at this time I would be glad to reply fully to the Senator from Nevada, but I am inclined to defer doing so until we can have an opportunity of bringing it up in a proper way and without the interference of other legislation. I think it will only cause friction to anticipate the matter. I am only making the suggestion to the Senator and not in any sense criticizing him. I see no reason at this time to either praise or censure the Reclamation Service. It is entitled to much praise at all appropriate times here and elsewhere; but to claim it above any criticism at all times and everywhere is more praise than can justly be bestowed on any work of human hands. Let us hope that the reclamation projects may proceed to accomplish their promised benefits and may be so justly and equitably settled as to exclude the necessity of legislation.

REPORTS OF DISSATISFACTION ARE ILL ADVISED.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have no disposition to foreclose the Senator in any way or to put him under any embarrassment. I simply say to him—he probably was not here during the debate yesterday—that I am only referring to matters that were presented then, and by way of explanation, not by way of criticizing anybody. No one recognizes more than I do the sincerity and desire for accuracy of the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], who made some remarks yesterday and presented matters to which I am now making a reply, not for the purpose of going into a discussion of these items, but to emphasize the point that this is not the time or place to try to debate details of this character. I simply wish, in the best of temper, to present to him the view which I think is the correct one with reference to this great enterprise, and I also wish to present, to western men particularly, the importance, if possible, of our adjusting these matters between ourselves in our committee meetings. We are overwhelmingly represented upon the Irrigation Committees of both Houses, and we can undoubtedly adjust all these questions there. We can bring the officials before us at any moment and enter into an inquiry with reference to any one of the irrigation projects, as we have already done. It seems to me quite inadvisable for us to give the southern, the middle western, and the eastern Representatives in the House of Representatives and in the Senate a mistaken impression regarding this entire enterprise, for I find by actual observation that chance remarks made both in the House and in the Senate, the result of communications, oftentimes half truths, oftentimes the result of inaccurate information received from constituents and in letters from constituents, are making an impression upon Senators and Representatives who do not represent our region, and an unfavorable impression regarding the efficiency and the success of this great enterprise.

It is the first great collective effort that the Nation has undertaken, and I should regret to see collectivism in so worthy a work stricken down by its own friends.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator, except to say this: The unfinished business is a very important matter, and has been standing in the way of important general appropriation bills for two days now while this private claim, whatever its merits may be, having no general interest to the country whatever, but very important to the claimants, has occupied the floor here for two days, to the exclusion of all other business.

Now, at 2 o'clock the unfinished business will come up again. I want to be perfectly reasonable about the matter, but I think that this time, which is of great value to the proponents of this measure, ought to be consumed in discussion upon the measure itself really. I do not want to lay aside the unfinished business for this bill again to-day, and yet I feel that the claimants are entitled to a vote, if one can be had.

I wish to inquire of the Senator from Nevada whether we could not get a unanimous-consent agreement for a time to vote on this bill, some hour within a reasonable time, say, within an hour, or something like that? I desire to ask the Senator how long, probably, it will be before he will conclude the present theme on which he is now addressing the Senate?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am quite in sympathy with the Senator from Connecticut in his purpose, and I should not have addressed the Senate at such length had it not been for the incidental reference to these outside matters.

I wish this bill for relief to those who furnished labor and material to the Shoshone enterprise to go through, but I do not wish it to go through upon an indictment against the efficiency and the integrity and capacity of a great service that has served the Government well. I wish it to go through upon its own merits and the equitable considerations that should control the right of these people to compensation. If I can get the consent of the Senate, which I have no doubt will be accorded, to put into the RECORD certain data which I have here, I will conclude my remarks.

Reference has been made to the cost of work executed under the reclamation act and the assertion made that this is more expensive than private enterprise. This depends upon how the comparison is made. If it is made on equal basis, as it should be, the results will probably show, unless I am greatly mistaken, that the Government work is being executed as economically as and more effectively than private work. It must be remembered that when the reclamation act was passed practically all of the easier available projects were taken up. The cheap ones had been built, development was stagnant because individuals did not dare to invest in other more expensive and difficult works.

The passage of the reclamation act, the building of works by the Government, stimulated corporate investment, and if we compare on the same basis the cost of these works, we will find that those private works which have been built since 1902 have cost for the same class of work as much, if not more, than those built by the engineers of the Reclamation Service.

I have before me a statement from a recent hearing, which gives the price per acre of some private works.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent to insert certain matter in the RECORD, and without objection leave will be granted.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The matter referred to is a statement contained in a recent House hearing, which shows:

COMPARATIVE COST OF PROJECTS.

Taking for comparison one of the recent works of private enterprise, namely, that of the Orchard mesa project near Grand Junction, Colo., it is stated that this work is costing the landowners about $125 per acre with interest on deferred payments. This has between 4 or 5 miles of wooden bench flume which will decay in possibly from 7 to 10 years and must be replaced, so that the actual cost of maintenance must be large. In comparison with this are the works built by the Reclamation Service—for example, that of the Uncompahgre project, which has a 6-mile tunnel and permanent concrete structure, the cost per acre for which will probably not exceed one-half the cost of the Orchard Mesa project and will be far more permanent.

The Denver Reservoir & Irrigation Co. is constructing a system of irrigation from which they expect to deliver five-eighths of an acre-foot of water per year for each acre, with a charge of $45 with interest. All of the Government projects furnish from two to three or more acre-feet per year, according to soil and locality, so that even at the same price the Government project is many times cheaper. In Paradox Valley, near the Uncompahgre project, the water will be furnished for $45 per acre with interest. The Routt County Development Co. is preparing to water 39,000 acres in Routt County at $45 per acre with interest. The Colorado Land & Water Co. is reclaiming land in La Platt County, Colo., at $45 per acre. The Two-Butte Irrigation & Reservoir Co. have constructed a reservoir in Prowers County for furnishing additional stored water, mostly to land which already has partial water right, at $35 per acre. The Toltec Canal Co. is reclaiming land in Conejos County for which they propose to charge $45 per acre. The Valley Investment Co. is reclaiming 24,000 acres in Bent County, for which the water right will cost $60 per acre. The Great Northern Irrigation & Power Co. in Routt County is charging $45 per acre for land which they reclaim.

Relative to reclamation in the North Platte Valley in Wyoming and Nebraska, for the North Platte project the charge per acre is $45, including a reservoir supply, and this also includes the first two years of operation and maintenance. In the same valley the Farmers Irrigation Co. have built the Tri-State Canal, for which they are charging $40 per acre for water, with interest, and have no reservoir water and a very insecure supply in the river.

In comparing the relative value of the two water rights last mentioned, it may be stated that below the end of the North Platte project there are 20,000 acres of land that can be watered by the Tri-State Canal, built by private enterprise, or the North Platte project, built by the Government, equally as well, but the farmers demand and are using every effort possible to keep the Tri-State from irrigating this land and trying to get the Government to irrigate it from the North Platte project, for the reason that they know that the Government is prepared to furnish them ample water and that the construction will be so much better than that done by private enterprise. The Government builds all the lateral system to each farm for the price mentioned while the private-enterprise projects do not build any lateral system.

In South Dakota the Bellefourche project is costing the land owners $30 per acre for a minimum supply of 2 acre-feet. On the other hand, the Red Water Canal Co. is charging $50 an inch, or $2,500 per second-foot for the water they supply.

The Government project is supported by a reservoir having a capacity of 200,000 acre-feet, while the Red Water Canal has no reservoir water to supply the land during low periods. The farmers under the Red Water Canal made application two years ago for the Government to take the canal over, and they would be glad to pay the price if the same was incorporated in the Bellefourche project. The Government was unable to do so on account of shortage of funds.

Other projects which may be mentioned are the Pueblo-Rocky Ford Irrigation Co., near Pueblo, which proposes to reclaim a large area of land out of the Arkansas River, which is already twice overappropriated, at a cost of $150 per acre, which includes the cost of the land. However, this land without water would not be worth over $10 or $15 per acre, thus making the water right cost them about $135 per acre. In northern Colorado the Greeley Poudre Irrigation Co. is constructing a system to reclaim a large area of land at an estimated cost of $45 per acre. In Idaho the Big Lost River project will cost $40.50 per acre and the Dietrick project $50.50 per acre. All of the private enterprises must necessarily charge interest on all deferred payments, in addition to the original cost which I have herein given.

With the present organization under the Reclamation Service it is believed that work is being done much cheaper than by private enterprise, if we consider the quality of the work in each case, its durability, and ultimate cost to the landowner.

In attempting to compare the cost of some of the older private canals it must be borne in mind that when these canals were first constructed there was but a small amount of land under irrigation. The water rights were sold for about what they cost the company, or if in a cooperative system for about what the works cost to construct. As the land was brought under cultivation, however, and became more valuable, the water rights increased in value until at the present time these water rights cost considerably more per acre than similar and possibly better rights under the Government projects.

The following table gives approximately the total acreage cost of water right per acre for a number of the larger recent private projects, these being given for comparison with the estimated cost of the Government enterprises:

Mr. MYERS. May I interrupt the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. MYERS. In pursuance of the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], who has kindly expressed his willingness to again temporarily lay aside the unfinished business, which will come up at 2 o'clock, and without any wish whatever to restrict the argument of the Senator from Nevada, or any other Senator, but wishing that there may be full debate to completion on this bill and being glad to hear from the Senator from Nevada and from all concerned, I will suggest, if it meets with the approval of those who are interested in the bill and others that, by unanimous consent, we take a vote on this measure this day not later than 3.30 o'clock.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Make it 2.30 o'clock.

Mr. MYERS. We may get to it by 2.30 o'clock, and I hope we will do so. But I suggest not later than 3.30 o'clock.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not later than 3 o'clock and as much earlier as possible.

Mr. MYERS. There are several other Senators who have taken an interest in this matter and who wish to say a few words, and I wish them to speak and I should like to have the Senator from Nevada conclude.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Three o'clock would give an hour and a quarter more, and even if there are six Senators who want to speak it would give each Senator 15 minutes, and it seems to me enough could be said in 15 minutes in addition to what has been said.

Mr. MYERS. There may be some Senators who wish to speak against the bill. I do not desire to restrict anybody who wants to speak.

Mr. ROOT. I wish to say I should not feel like agreeing to a unanimous consent which would probably much prolong the discussion on this bill. I think the Senate has devoted all the time it ought to to this subject, and it seems to me that 3 o'clock is as far as we ought to go. There has been very full discussion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator from Montana would modify his request that a vote be taken on this matter not later than 3 o'clock, I certainly would be willing to give my consent to such an agreement, provided that it will not interfere with the position of the unfinished business.

Mr. MYERS. I thank the Senator from Connecticut for his willingness to yield temporarily on the unfinished business, and if there be no objection to 3 o'clock on the part of other Senators it will be agreeable to me. I pause to hear if there is any objection from others. [A pause.]

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I raise the parliamentary inquiry whether such consent would displace the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that it will not interfere with the unfinished business.

The Chair will state the request made by the Senator from Connecticut, which is that the vote be taken on the bill now under consideration at not later than 3 o'clock this afternoon. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. BORAH. I do not desire to delay the matter, but the Senator from Montana was not listening at the time the Chair stated the question. I wish the Chair would again state the question.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum. I understand there are other Senators who desire to be heard on the matter, and I should be glad to hear them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Crane	Jones	Simmons
Bacon	Culberson	Kenyon	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Cullom	La Follette	Smith, Ga.
Bourne	Cummins	Myers	Smith, Mich.
Bradley	Dillingham	Newlands	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	du Pont	Overman	Smoot
Bristow	Fall	Page	Sutherland
Bryan	Fletcher	Perkins	Thornton
Burnham	Gallinger	Pomerene	Townsend
Burton	Gronna	Rayner	Watson
Catron	Guggenheim	Reed	Wetmore
Chamberlain	Johnson, Me.	Sanders	Works
Clapp	Johnston, Ala.	Shively

Mr. THORNTON. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. FOSTER], and I desire that this announcement shall stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I regret that we can not have the attention of more Senators to this matter, because I realize that as Senators generally desire to sustain a committee report, so, on the same basis, they probably expect to vote to sustain the veto of the President. But it seems to me that the facts in this case would warrant every Senator in voting to pass this bill notwithstanding the veto of the President.

These people come here because they have no legal rights anywhere else. They come upon the equities of their claim to Congress, the only body that can give them relief. It has been suggested by some that this bill should have gone to the Committee on Claims; that it is in the nature of a claim; and that it should have been acted upon by that committee. I happen to be a member of the committee to which this bill was referred, as well as the Claims Committee, and I know that very extended hearings were had there. It was suggested in the committee that the bill ought to be reported back to the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims, but it was finally decided by the committee that the members of the Irrigation Committee, who were especially familiar with the irrigation conditions and the character of these contracts and the difficulties under which the contractors labor in connection with these irrigation works, were really better able to pass upon a bill of this kind than the Committee on Claims, most of the members of which are unfamiliar with these conditions. Therefore the Committee on Irrigation deliberately refused to report the bill back to the Senate with the request that it be referred to the Committee on Claims, but held jurisdiction of it, investigated it, had hearings, inquired into all the facts and all the circumstances in connection with this claim with very great care, and my recollection of it is that the report of the committee to the Senate was unanimous.

By reason of these hearings I became fairly familiar with the case, and its equities appealed very strongly to me. It seemed to me that Congress and the Government could not do any other than allow this bill. It was reported unanimously to the Senate, as I said, and passed, as we pass many other bills—without objection and without special consideration.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from Washington makes the statement that the report on this bill was unanimous. The Senator does not mean to say that the whole committee was present in the consideration of the bill and joined in the report, does he?

Mr. JONES. I do not remember now whether all the members of the committee were present or not. When I say a unanimous report, I mean just as we use that term here in stating that a report of a committee is unanimous; that is, that there was a quorum present in the committee, and that there was no objection on the part of any member who was present to its report. When the Senator puts it in that way I will not say that all the members of the committee were present. I do not remember; I do not know.

Mr. WORKS. I asked the question because I am a member of that committee, and I usually try to attend the sessions of all committees of which I am a member, where the sessions do not conflict, and I certainly never joined in any report in respect to this particular bill and never was present at any hearing which we hear talked about so much on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator from California was not present, but a quorum of the committee joined in unanimously reporting the bill favorably.

Mr. JONES. I can testify to the faithful attendance of the Senator from California on the committees of which he is a member, because I am a member of two or three of his committees. I did not intend to mean by my expression that every member of the committee was present, because, as I said, I do not know, and, of course, the Senator from California knows whether he was present or not. But what I meant by it was that there was a quorum present, and there was no objection made; and I always understand when a Senator states here that a bill is reported unanimously that it is a report by a quorum of the committee, without any objection. That is all I intended to say.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of Michigan in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield further to the Senator from California?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. I did not criticize the statement of the Senator from Washington, but, as I have been saying some things here in opposition to this bill, I do not want it to appear that I was acting inconsistently with respect to it—casting my vote one way in the committee and talking another way on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. JONES. I am glad the Senator made that statement, because I did not want to put him in an inconsistent position.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a statement in the message of the President. I believe that the President wrote his message on the information sent to him and given to him by the department. He could not give attention to all the details in connection with this matter and had to take the recommendation and advice of the Secretary of the Interior. But I think the President—and I say this in no criticizing way at all—misapprehended the letter of the Secretary, because the President says:

> To require that this additional amount should now be included in the assessment upon the lands is by law to increase a contract burden by a change of the character of the liability after it has been assumed and fixed.

The liability of settlers upon 128,000 acres of this land has not been assumed and has not been fixed, and no contract has been entered into between them and the Government that could be affected in any way, shape, or form by the passage of this legislation. The Secretary, in effect, says this in his letter printed with the message.

Furthermore, the Secretary of the Interior, in his letter to the President, does not base his recommendation to the President that this law be not signed upon any such contractual relation. The Secretary gives as his reason for recommending the disappproval of the bill the following:

> The chief engineer of the Reclamation Service advises me that the water-right charge already imposed and to be imposed upon the lands in the project is, in view of the nature and value of the lands, now at the maximum of safety, and that the addition which the pending bill would render necessary would be a heavy burden upon all future settlers and water-right contractors and would seriously jeopardize the success of the project.

Now, notice:

Under these circumstances, I am reluctantly compelled to advise that the bill should not receive your approval.

Listen!

If the lands of the project were able to bear the additional charge I would gladly advise otherwise.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Washington will suspend for a moment, the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In accordance with the understanding arrived at a few minutes ago, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Washington will proceed.

Mr. JONES. So the Secretary of the Interior expressly bases his recommendation to the President that this bill be not signed upon the possibility of an increase in the burden, jeopardizing the success of the reclamation project, and he expressly states that if he were not satisfied of that fact he would recommend the passage of the bill. In other words, Senators, all through this proposition no question is made as to the equities of the claims of these people. The Secretary in his letter said:

The laborers and claimants who seek relief through the pending bill have suffered undoubted hardship.

Now then, it seems to me that these people, having no legal rights or remedies that they can enforce, coming to the Senate upon equities that are unquestioned by anyone, not even by the department itself, the Senate should feel fully justified in giving them relief. If this additional burden is imposed upon the land on which there are now no settlers, 128,000 acres, I think, for which no water rights have been contracted and upon which the Secretary has authority under legislation passed by us to increase if necessary the pro rata burden, if the lands can bear this additional amount, which is no more than 3 cents an acre, it seems to me that we ought not to hesitate in that respect, and if the burden now is figured down to the point where an addition of 3 cents an acre will ruin the project it is in a very precarious condition.

A suggested criticism yesterday as to the department assessing this additional burden upon these lands I do not really agree with, because Congress itself has provided the way in which the cost of these projects shall be assessed upon the land, and the department in doing that simply acts under the law and by the direction of the law. If any change should be made we should do it. The department is simply doing its duty under the law in these matters.

My recollection is that Congress passed a law under which we authorized the department to recancel its notices from time to time fixing the charges upon a project and to readjust them and give new notices, just for the purpose of meeting conditions where the estimated cost of the project was less than the actual cost, and where settlers had not gone in and taken the land. In order that the law should be complied with and the cost of the project assessed against the land, we authorized the Secretary to cancel the notices issued and readjust the charges and issue new notices. So we have recognized in that just exactly what we would recognize by the passage of this legislation, if it did result in imposing the claims of these people upon the lands for which no settlers have yet applied. Notices have been changed and charges increased on lands in different projects, and settlers coming after such increase can not complain.

I have just as much regard and just as much solicitude for the settlers of this country as any Member of this body, and yet it does seem to me that no one can complain if before any contract is entered into the settler knows what he will have to pay for his land. It does not seem to me that he can complain if it is a little bit more than those who first entered on the project had to pay, because he can enter into the contract or not, just as he sees fit. If he thinks the charges are too high, he need not enter the lands.

But, regardless of that, these people should not be required to bear this loss themselves. If it is inequitable and unjust to other settlers who may hereafter go on these lands to pay what amounts to 3 cents an acre for 10 years, if it is unjust to them to bear that burden, let us pass this bill and then pass legislation crediting that project with the amount of it and repay it out of the Treasury of the United States.

Some say let us sustain this veto and let these people come here with a claim. If they would ever get it that way, they would get justice in the end, it is true, but I say we have passed the bill, we have recognized their equity, and why not give it to them now and not turn them back to the uncertainties of getting a claim bill through Congress. I have often thought that if I had the money I would rather pay any claim of my constituents than try to get it through Congress, because it is almost an impossible task. But if we do relieve them, as I said, and if we believe that the project ought not to bear this charge, let us pay these people their money, and let us bring a bill in here to relieve the project from the payment. Do not put on them the burden of getting other legislation. It will not hurt the Government to do without this money for a while. It may ruin these poor people to be put to further delay.

The situation is simply this: The Government entered into a contract with a certain party to build this tunnel for a certain sum. It was a $750,000 contract. It took a $75,000 bond to protect itself. The contractor failed. Why he failed, it seems to me, is immaterial. He failed. But while he was carrying on the work these people furnished supplies and money and goods and all that sort of thing, that went into the project. They furnished these to the contractor in the belief that they had security for it if he did not pay it. As was suggested by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], they knew that under their State law when they furnished material or labor in any State work that any contractor was carrying on they would have a lien, and they supposed—and this was brought out before the committee—they had a like remedy or a like protection in this case. They did not know what the law was. They had not looked it up. They had not examined the contract between the contractor and the Government. They knew they were dealing with a contractor with the United States. I submit they had every reason to believe that this Government of ours would see to it that material men and labor men had protection. But instead of that the Government had passed a law under which material men and labor men could not hold the contractor on his bond, but the United States was put in the place of those people and its claim for reimbursement for what it may have to expend was put ahead of them. The act had not been passed very long, and even if those people had known of the law under which they had the right to sue the bondsmen of the contractor, they had not had time to learn of its repeal.

The contractor failed. He could not pay these bills. The material and money of these people went into the project. It got the benefit of them. The Government has the contractor's bond, but it is of no benefit to these honest claimants. The equities and the justice are upon the side of paying these people this money, and doing it now by the passage of this bill.

As I said, the President, it seems to me, from his own message and from the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, wrote that message under a misapprehension, because there were no contracts under the letter of the Secretary that would be violated. There were no contracts existing in reference to water rights for these lands. They had their proportionate benefit from the supplies furnished and the moneys paid by these people.

It does seem to me that the Senate ought to act upon this measure favorably in behalf of these claimants. If we think that the project should not bear this burden hereafter, let some one introduce a bill to relieve the project from it, but do not keep these people out of their money any longer, in order that possibly the Government may be protected or saved. There is nothing which makes the people lose confidence in the Government so much as to find the Government mistreating its individual citizens. Everyone concedes the justice of these claims. Congress can not afford to refuse to pay them on a purely technical plea.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. As I remember it, it was stated on the floor the other day that the amount of one of these claims is about $10,000. Is that claim held by an original claimant, or is that claim now owned by some speculator who has bought it up, and if so, for what consideration?

Mr. JONES. I do not remember just what the different items of these various claims are. My recollection is that in the hearings before the committee there was no showing at all that any of these claims were held by speculators. My recollection is, but I may be mistaken, that the claims are still held by all the people who actually furnished the money to the laborers, and who took up time checks and labor checks and furnished materials.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. The Senator from Montana can probably give more definite information on that point than I can.

Mr. MYERS. Ten thousand dollars of this $42,000 is a claim held by and is due to Mr. and Mrs. McDonald, small merchants of Butte, Mont. The claims for the balance of the $42,000 are still owned and held by the original claimants. They have simply been turned over to Mr. and Mrs. McDonald for the purpose of looking after the collection thereof and getting relief from Congress if possible. Their $10,000 is justly due and owing to them. Outside of that they have no interest in any of the rest of the $42,000. It goes to the original claimants. There is no speculation and there is no speculator involved in the matter at all.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have nothing further to say. This claim, from the time I went into it and got at the facts, appealed to me as one that should appeal to the conscience and sense of justice of Congress, and the more I look into it the more firmly am I convinced of the justice and merit of the case and of the injustice in Congress refusing to pay it, and refusing to pay it now.

Mr. SMOOT obtained the floor.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to ask the Senator from Washington a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Washington is so much more familiar with the case than I am that I wish to ask him in what respect this legislation is retroactive in character or does he think it is in any way of a retroactive character?

Mr. JONES. I do not think it is at all. I can not see wherein it is retroactive in the legal sense.

Mr. KENYON. The President seems to base his veto on the thought that the legislation is of a retroactive character. The Senator from Washington thinks it is not?

Mr. JONES. I am satisfied it is not. I have my views as to why the President came to make that statement, as far as that is concerned. No doubt he consulted with the Secretary of the Interior in regard to the bill and the claims, and he probably told him about the conditions of the law that we had repealed—the law some years ago taking away the right of the material men to sue a contractor's bondsman and giving back the right to the United States. He was told that the claims of these material men originated after that repeal, and that they had no right to it, and that this bill was really restoring the repealed law for the benefit of these people, and he, no doubt, got the impression that it would impose an additional burden on settlers who now have contracts with the Government. That, of course, should not be done, and could not be done, and is not attempted by this bill.

Mr. KENYON. I wanted to understand how this legislation could be of a retroactive character, and I wanted the views of the Senator from Washington on the subject.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that the President was doubtless under a misapprehension as to the effect of this action upon existing contracts. A reading of his message will disclose that he supposed it would affect the prices settlers who had made contracts with the Government would have to pay for their land, whereas as a matter of fact it appears by the statement made by the Secretary of the Interior that the additional price will not be imposed upon those who are now upon the land but simply upon settlers in the future who may enter upon the land.

Mr. JONES. The Secretary states in his letter, which I read a moment ago, that he would advise the approval of this legislation were it not for the fear that it might make the project a failure, and not because it was retroactive.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not intend to take very much of the Senate's time this afternoon. This matter has been pretty thoroughly discussed. I would very much prefer to pay what moral obligation the Government is under in this case by a direct appropriation to the parties making the claim, and if they are entitled to the amount of the claim I want to say they should be paid the amount, but not in the way this bill provides. I recognize the force that an appeal to sympathy has, but that should not be considered, for there is a greater question than sympathy involved in this measure.

Mr. President, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] in his speech yesterday made this statement:

They—

Speaking of the creditors of the contractor—

They credited these people on the strength of the fact that they were dealing with the Government, believing that the law of 1894 was in force, and were so advised.

The Senator was mistaken in that statement or else the parties certainly were advised by nobody who had read the contract. The contract specifically stated that it was under the law of 1905, and if anyone was led astray it was not by the contract nor was it by the advertisement for bids, because the advertisement for the bids referred to the law of 1905.

Mr. MYERS. May I interrupt the Senator just a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. MYERS. I have no doubt of the correctness of the Senator's statement. That the contract was made in that way, I think, is entirely correct. But what I meant to say was, and what I will say now is, that I do not believe, and the hearings will show it, that the different small tradesmen and dealers who let this subcontractor have supplies had access to or knew anything about what was in the contract, because the contract was purely between the contractor and the Government. The people who let the contractor have supplies only knew that they were furnishing supplies for a Government contractor, and they had been advised and believed that under the law they had the first right to sue on the bond.

Mr. SMOOT. I wanted the record clear on that point, and that is the reason I called the Senator's attention to the statement made; I thought he would agree to that correction.

Mr. President, this bill was introduced in the Senate and referred to the proper committee. That committee considered it and reported it back to the Senate, with no written report whatever. It went to the calendar, was brought up by unanimous consent, was never discussed a minute, and passed. It went to the House and was considered by a committee of the House. There was a minority report made in the House and signed by three Members, as the Senator from Montana stated.

I was told by a Member of the House yesterday that this bill was brought up for consideration at the time every Member signing the minority report was in Baltimore at the Democratic convention.

I am referring to the legislative procedure on the bill, and I am going to call attention to the minority report. That is in order. It is a House document, and I have a perfect right to refer to the report made by the minority of the House committee. The minority report of the House says:

The claims to which this bill relates are claims for labor and material furnished the subcontractor, the Western Construction Co., for which the Government in no way has bound itself to pay. No one acting for the Government at any time promised to pay these claims or in any way led the claimants to believe or expect the Government would pay them. They were merely the personal obligations of the Western Construction Co.

They also say:

Boiled down, the real question here presented is, Who shall suffer—the water users, who are entirely innocent of any wrongdoing in the premises, or these claimants, who neglected to take security or to protect themselves when they had the opportunity to do so? Their dealings were not with the Government, not with the contractor, but with the subcontractor, and they did so at their peril. What right had they under the circumstances to look to the Government for security?

Mr. President, the Secretary of the Interior, in his letter dated July 12, 1912, addressed to the President, makes this statement:

If the bill becomes a law, it will bring to naught the work done in instituting the suit and in protracted negotiations for settlement. The precedent will probably be followed in future cases, with the result that the Government's security will be of little value in any case. I am of the opinion that reasonable security for the claims of laborers and material men should be given by the Government's withholding payment on the contract during a time fixed for the filing of notice of such claims, payment thereafter to be made to the contractor or claimant as may be ordered by the proper court. This would require general legislation.

Now, as to where this burden will fall, if the veto message is not sustained and the bill becomes a law, there are 22,000 acres under existing contracts in the project that will not be affected. It is true that under those contracts the burden will not fall upon the entrymen, because the Reclamation Service had named the amount per acre that shall be paid for the water under those contracts, based upon its actual cost at the time, and the actual cost did not include the $42,000 involved in this bill. There are, however, 12,000 acres that will be compelled, unless it bears its share of the $42,000, to be canceled, as there are existing to-day public notices of 12,000 acres. Notices have already been given upon 12,000 additional acres, and the proportion of the $42,000 will fall upon that 12,000 acres, even if they decide to spread it over the 128,000 acres, as suggested by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there is no legal difficulty in the Government recalling those notices, I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. None whatever.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Government will simply suffer the expense which it has incurred in issuing the notices. It is simply a question whether the Government ought to suffer that very little expense or whether these people ought to suffer it.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not the only question. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that if they do recall the notices and these people do decide to take up the 12,000 acres which they have already decided to do, then, if the notices are recalled, the price must be made 33 cents an acre more, and this burden will fall upon the entrymen who have already given notice of taking up the 12,000 acres, and not only that, but it will fall upon all the other 116,000 acres, at 33 cents an acre.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. REED. The Senator, I take it, is quite familiar with the irrigation problem. I want to ask him how much this land, speaking broadly, is worth before irrigation?

Mr. SMOOT. Very little, indeed, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. Practically nothing, except——

Mr. SMOOT. In some locations, I will say, not to exceed whatever the grazing value would be, perhaps $2 to $5 an acre.

Mr. REED. What is it worth after successful irrigation?

Mr. SMOOT. That would greatly depend upon the character of the land; but I should judge that if the water project costs $34 an acre, with the original cost of, say, $5, making $39 an acre, it would be at least worth a little more than that.

Mr. REED. That is getting at the value of what it cost to put the water on. Of course that would not be a safe way to get at it, because you might put water upon the ground at an expense of $100 an acre and it might not be worth $50. Then again you might put water on it at an expense of $10 an acre and the land might be worth $100. I wanted to know if the Senator is familiar with this land, and if so what the facts are about this particular land, and if he is not familiar with this land, what the general rule is in regard to the increase of value?

Mr. SMOOT. All I can say is that I have never been upon the land; I do not know what character of land it is; but I notice that the Secretary of the Interior in his letter to the President says:

> The bill properly provides that the United States shall not be involved by it in any expense. The laborers and claimants who seek relief through the pending bill have suffered undoubted hardship. The effect of the proposed statute would be to shift that hardship to such water users on the Shoshone reclamation project, or the part of it served by the Corbett Tunnel, as hereafter settle upon the public lands or initiate irrigation on the private lands under the project.

And then he says:

> The chief engineer of the Reclamation Service advises me that the water-right charge already imposed and to be imposed upon the lands in the project is, in view of the nature and value of the lands, now at the maximum of safety, and that the addition which the pending bill would render necessary would be a heavy burden upon all future settlers and water-right contractors and would seriously jeopardize the success of the project.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator as a business man—and he is, I understand, a very good business man, as I have been led to believe from many observations I have made of his grasp of business propositions here before the Senate, and I say that in all seriousness——

Mr. SMOOT. I thank the Senator.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator believe that any living man can figure on a project of this magnitude and get within 33 cents an acre of the actual outcome?

Mr. SMOOT. As to the actual result?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. No; Mr. President, I do not.

Mr. REED. Then, does the Senator believe that the Government of the United States would ever be warranted in entering upon an irrigation project of such doubtful value that the expense would come within 33 cents an acre of the total value of the project?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is not the question that we are discussing at all. This is a private claim of $42,000 made against the Government, and the question is as to who shall bear the burden of the claim.

Mr. REED. I understand that.

Mr. SMOOT. Shall it be borne by the parties who furnished material and supplies or cashed labor time checks, or shall it be passed on to the entrymen? That is the question.

Mr. REED. I understand that is the question, but I am getting to that question, I think, by a pretty straight road. If it is true that this project costs very nearly the entire value of its possible benefits, and that 33 cents an acre added to it will make the project impracticable, then it is not any use to any man living upon this earth, whether he is a settler or a prospective settler; and if our Government has ever entered upon any such project, then it needs a guardian appointed to oversee the action of the men who are responsible for such an undertaking. It seems to me it can not be true that we are so near the line that 33 cents will push us over it, and that the Secretary of the Interior must be mistaken.

The reason this is in point, if the Senator will pardon me, is this: If this is a good project, then 33 cents an acre will not ruin it; and if 33 cents an acre does ruin it, no prospective settler can be deprived of more than the possible profit of 33 cents an acre. If that is all he can count on, the settler had better never enter the land; it would be absurd to do so.

One thing further—for I do not intend to debate the question, but rather to conclude that thought—the settlers are merely in futuro; they are not required to settle upon this ground. If they find that 33 cents an acre has ruined their fortunes and their chances, they will not be obliged to locate the land. Therefore they are being deprived of nothing. You are not putting the burden on a man who is there, who has made an investment; you are simply saying to a man who may make an investment, "It is going to cost you 33 cents more an acre." If that is all the profit there is to be gained, then it does seem to me that nobody will be very badly hurt by being kept off the ground.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is only one question involved in this whole controversy. Here are certain private claims amounting to $42,000, and most Senators, I believe, feel that there is an equity and a right in those claims; but if we pass the bill as it is, the amount of those claims will be passed on to the entrymen, and I can not for the life of me see why the entrymen should be compelled to pay an extra 33 cents an acre. The entrymen were not responsible for the loss incurred, nor was the Government responsible in any way for it.

I want to say to the Senator that from what I know of the claims and from what I have learned from the discussion of this measure in the Senate I am perfectly willing that the Government of the United States should pay $42,000 out of the Treasury of the United States in settlement of the claims, but I do not want that $42,000 transferred to a project the actual cost of which is now so near the value of the land that the additional amount would be an unjust burden. It should not be placed on the entrymen, Senators, but it should be presented here as a claim against the Government. It should go to the Claims Committee, and that committee, if the equities are as presented, would, as the Senator from North Carolina said, report the bill favorably to this body, and the Senate would pass it. That is the proper way to handle this question.

I want to say to the Senator from Missouri, if a bill for such a claim is introduced and referred to the Committee on Claims, I, as a member of that committee, will favor reporting it favorably, providing that the Government of the United States shall pay the $42,000 out of the Treasury of the United States and not to pass it on to the entrymen under this project.

Mr. REED, Mr. WORKS, and Mr. BRISTOW addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will allow me, because I rather started this line of discussion, as I understand, this is the situation: The man who took the contract took it for less than actual cost.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know whether he did or not; but at least he could not perform the contract and carry the work through at the figure at which he took it.

Mr. REED. It seems to be admitted that he took it for less than actual cost. Therefore he failed in the actual construction of the work. He purchased certain materials and supplies, the benefit of which, of course, went into the actual improvement of the land. If that is true, then we arrive at the conclusion that there has been no inflation in the cost of the work.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, allow me to call the Senator's attention there to the fact that the Government has already paid for the $42,000 of material and supplies; that is, it paid the money to the contractor, and it has been charged up to the project. If the Government pays again the amount as provided in this bill, it is a double charge on the project.

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. SMOOT. It certainly is.

Mr. REED. As I understand, the facts——

Mr. SMOOT. I understand them that way.

Mr. REED. Let me see if I get it right. I think the Senator misunderstands me or I misunderstand him, and we will get a little light, perhaps, by pleasantly discussing it.

This man took a contract to build, at a certain price, a canal to carry the water to the ground. The contract price has been paid, but the contract price was less than the actual cost, and that difference was in part made up by the supplies furnished by the people who now make this claim.

Mr. SMOOT. The contractor only did 16.2 per cent of the work. The Government assumed charge after that and carried on the project to completion.

Mr. REED. Yes; but all the supplies the contractor got went into the work, and the Government took the work off his hands. The Senator does not mean to say that they paid him the full contract, and then are asked to pay this in addition?

Mr. SMOOT. They paid the contractor for all the work he did up to the time he failed and charged the amount to the project. If anyone got the advantage of this $42,000, it was the contractor.

Mr. REED. But did the contractor make any profit?

Mr. SMOOT. The contractor did not; he failed.

Mr. REED. But let us say, to take an illustration, that the contractor was paid $200,000; that he himself actually paid out $200,000, and then owed these debts. Is not that about the condition that the matter is in?

Mr. SMOOT. Well, it would be 16 per cent of $750,000.

Mr. REED. Yes; I am merely taking an arbitrary figure.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, the Senator's suggestion would be correct.

Mr. REED. Then, after all, the Government did not pay any more than this work cost, and will not pay any more than the work actually cost if they pay the $42,000; and it is for that reason only the Senator from Utah says that he is willing to appropriate the money.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; that is not the reason at all. The Senator from Missouri and I can not agree upon that if that is the position the Senator is going to take. Now, the facts in the case are these: The contractor undertook the work for $750,000, and started upon it. As the Senator knows, the beginning of any project, the starting-up process, is very expensive. Some contractors are prepared for this class of work, while others are not. Evidently Mr. Spear was not. A contractor prepared for this class of work may have been able to make money on the contract price of $750,000; but Mr. Spear could not do so, nor did he do so. He made a failure of it. The estimates of his work were made every month, and he was paid for what he did.

Mr. REED. The full amount?

Mr. SMOOT. The Secretary of the Interior says that he was paid for the work done.

Mr. REED. He was paid 90 per cent, I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. The general rule is to pay 90 per cent.

Mr. CUMMINS. We are getting into an error there, if I may be permitted to intervene. The contractor did about 16 per cent of the work before he failed and was paid 90 per cent, the amount thereby due, but the contract price was not enough to pay for the supplies and labor in question. If the Senator from Utah is right, then, of course, there ought to be only $750,000 charged up to this project. The Government went on and completed the work, I suppose, as cheaply as it could be done and it cost the Government over $900,000 all told; and the excess is charged up to the project.

Mr. SMOOT. As I understand, what the Senator says is absolutely true; but not only was the extra expense which is attached to all projects in their initial stages charged to this project, but when the Government was compelled to assume charge of the work it had to incur that same extra expense of getting the working force in motion. That, I suppose, is one reason why the project cost a great deal more than was anticipated in the first place.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, we are getting a little aside and beyond the point I had in mind when I took the floor the last time, and I want to return to that. The Senator speaks of the hardships of settlers who may hereafter conclude to locate on this land. They do not have to locate on this land; nobody can compel them to do so; they will not locate there unless it is to their advantage. It seems to me that we are exactly in the shape that a man is in who starts to build a house and employs a contractor to build it. The contractor does not pay the material men, and a mechanic's lien is filed; and it ultimately transpires that the material men have to be paid, and they are paid. A purchaser comes along and wants to buy that house. The man who built it adds to the price of the house or counts in the price all that he has paid out. If the purchaser wants to buy it, well and good; but if he does not want to buy it because he thinks the price is too high, he has not been deprived of any right; he has not been injured; nobody is taking his money away from him. Here is this land. If we add 33 cents an acre to it to pay these claimants their money, and a prospective settler thinks the price of the land is too high, where is that man injured; what right of his has been taken away?

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from Missouri has inquired of the Senator from Utah about the value of this land, with water and without it, as though the only question involved here was the value of the land. That is a great mistake. It is stated by the Senator from Missouri that the settlers are at liberty to settle upon the land or not, as they please; but if the Government has expended money on the project to an amount that would exclude settlers from it—in other words, if the amount is so great that they can not afford to settle upon it at all—then the whole purpose and object of the Reclamation Service is defeated. The object of the reclamation law is to reclaim the arid lands and to have them located by actual settlers, and the question is whether under these projects the expenditure of money has been so great that a settler can not enter upon the land, reclaim it, and make it useful to himself. It is not simply a question of the value of the land by any means; but the object and purpose of the law is to secure the settlement of the lands by actual settlers, and if the expense is made so great that they are not able to settle upon them, then the object of the law is defeated.

Mr. REED. If the Senator from Utah will yield to me, inasmuch as the Senator from California directed his remarks to me, I will ask, Does the Senator from California think that in the case of this project we are within 33 cents of the actual value of the land? If so, does he think the project amounts to anything or ever ought to have been entered upon?

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, in this particular case it is not a question of the amount. There is a principle involved that ought to be very seriously considered by the Senate. It is not a question whether in this particular case the addition of 33 cents an acre would be a great burden upon the particular settlers who may go upon this land in the future, but the whole policy of the Reclamation Service is involved in this controversy. If Congress can add from time to time to the burdens that are to be placed upon the settlers, then you are frittering away the whole purpose of the reclamation legislation.

Mr. REED. But, Mr. President, that is the very ground that is taken by the Senator from Utah and by the Secretary of the Interior, namely, that the only good reason why this bill should be defeated is that this particular project can not stand 33 cents an acre more. The closing paragraph of the Secretary's letter is:

> The chief engineer of the Reclamation Service advises me that the water-right charge already imposed and to be imposed upon the lands in the project is, in view of the nature and value of the lands, now at the maximum of safety.

Then he adds:

> Under these circumstances, I am reluctantly compelled to advise that the bill should not receive your approval.

That is the ground upon which this bill is being attacked; it is the ground the Secretary takes, and I am still undertaking to ascertain whether we have got a project out there that can not stand 33 cents more an acre.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me suggest to the Senator from Missouri that the total cost of this enterprise is $4,200,000, and the number of acres reclaimed is approximately about 150,000. That means less than $30 an acre for the water rights for this acreage. If we add 30 cents to that $30 it means an addition of only 1 per cent in the ultimate cost to the settler on this land, and that can be paid in a period of 10 years.

Mr. SMOOT. It is just as the Senator from California says; there is a principle involved in this matter. If we undertake to pass this bill, we will establish a precedent that is going to bother us in the future. Suppose the contractor had gone on and had not failed until 50 per cent of the work had been completed, and instead of $42,000 worth of accounts unpaid there had been $200,000 worth of such accounts, and then we were asked that that $200,000 be added to the price of the land for the entryman to pay, who would claim such a proceeding would be right? If such a precedent is to be followed, the cost of a project can be made so high that it would be an absolute failure, so far as the entryman settling upon the land is concerned, and then, not only would the Government lose its $200,000, or whatever amount it may be, but it would lose all, perhaps, that it had put in the project, or the difference between the cost of the project and the point to which the price was lowered at least, to enable the entryman to locate upon the land. In a case of a $4,000,000 project the loss might be half a million dollars or even more. That is the trouble in passing this bill; not the $42,000 involved, but the precedent we are establishing.

I understand the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] desires to address the Senate a short time, and as we are to vote in a few moments, I will yield to him.

Mr. BORAH. I do not care to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will allow me, I wish to make one inquiry. Assuming that the principle is now established that hereafter wherever a man furnishes material and labor in connection with an irrigation project he must be paid, as he ought to be paid, does not the Senator think that the Reclamation Service, through precautions with reference to the contractor's bond, through seeing to it, as the owner of a piece of property upon which buildings are being constructed would see to it, that men furnishing material and labor are paid before the Government payments are made, can hereafter properly guard against any such danger as the Senator anticipates?

Mr. SMOOT. No; Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Is it not the commonest thing in enterprises involving the construction of buildings in this country for the employer to guard himself even against the contractor, and to guard himself against the imposition of mechanic's liens and liens for supplies by withholding a certain amount of money, so that he can be assured before the enterprise is ended that every claim is paid?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that would perhaps be the case in constructing for the erection of a building, but on the great irrigation projects time checks are issued to men from all parts of the United States who carry those time checks from one place to another, believing, of course, that they are just as good as the money and that they can get the money for them whenever they want it. I know of railroad contracts where time checks have been issued and not paid for two or three years, the parties simply holding them the same as they would cash, thinking perhaps they are a little safer than cash, and the same thing is often true in the case of a project of this kind.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that in some of the States time checks, such as those to which the Senator refers issued in payment of material and labor, are made a preference lien against the railroad company and take precedence over its bonds.

Mr. SMOOT. I admit that, Mr. President, and so they were on Government projects, so far as the bondsmen of contractors were concerned, up to 1905; but the Congress of the United States changed the law of 1894 in 1905, and provided that they should not be a lien in preference to the lien of the Government of the United States. I wish to say that I do not approve of the change in the law. I think the laboring man ought to have the prior lien, and I think the law of 1894 was a better law than the law of 1905.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if that is true then we can meet the very difficulties which the Senator said we could not meet when he was discussing the proposition of time checks being carried around, and so forth.

Mr. SMOOT. That would make no difference in this case.

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator from Indiana desires to ask a question, I yield for a moment.

Mr. SHIVELY. I merely wanted to ask whether there is any dispute at all about the fact that the $42,000 involved in this case went into the irrigation project?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no dispute on that question.

Mr. SHIVELY. It was furnished by the laborers and by those who provided the supplies?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no dispute as to that.

Mr. SHIVELY. And they have never received anything for it?

Mr. SMOOT. The Government has paid the amount to the contractor, but the people to whom it is due have not received payment.

Mr. SHIVELY. They have never received any part of it and it is in the land to-day?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but if it is paid the second time, as provided for in the bill, and charged to the land, it will be a double charge upon the land.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, everyone agrees that there has been a loss to the people who furnished supplies and labor for this irrigation project, and everyone, so far as I know, agrees that it is a great hardship for them to suffer this loss. In its effect it comes not in the way of a general distribution or to hundreds and hundreds of settlers, or to thousands and thousands of taxpayers, but it is gathered and concentrated and falls with its entire effect and weight upon a few individuals who are unable to sustain the loss. Recognizing the fact that a loss has been sustained, everyone feels, it seems to me, that it ought to be taken care of; but we have not been able to agree on just how we should take care of it. A bill was introduced in the Senate and was referred to the Senate Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands. That bill was reported by the committee and passed by the Senate. It went to the House, where it was amended by the proper committee of the House, and as amended subsequently passed the House, and came back to the Senate and was agreed to in the form in which the House passed it. Had the bill passed as it was first presented to the Senate those who have been objecting to it in its present form would have been satisfied, but it was changed to satisfy those who had a different view. Between these different views, between these complicated propositions, the people who expended their money, their time, and their labor are suffering a loss which they can ill afford to stand and are not in a position to sustain.

Mr. President, they say that this burden will fall upon the settler. It will not fall upon the settler who has already made his contract; he is exempt and secure; it could at most only fall upon the man who goes upon the project hereafter, and who has full notice as to the value of the land, who knows whether he can afford to take the land, who is advised as to its price, and who takes the land with his eyes open and with a full understanding of what it is to cost him. I submit to the Senate, is it equitable to impose this entire loss upon these people, when the Government has received the benefit of the money, when some of the landholders have received the benefit of it, when the future landholders will receive the benefit of it, and when, in fact, everyone will receive a benefit, except those who have furnished it? Is it equitable to impose upon these people this loss without any compensation whatever?

Again, if we do not desire to impose the burden of the loss upon this irrigation project, all we have to do is to pass a simple bill relieving the project from the amount of money. After we have paid these people, we can follow this bill with another bill relieving the project. Such a bill will be offered here, not only with reference to this claim, but with reference to other claims, because in other cases costs have been incurred and expenditures have been made which ought not properly to fall upon the settlers; but, Mr. President, let us do one thing, and that is, as a Government, do justice to those who have furnished the means by which the settler and the Government have been benefited, and settle our difficulties hereafter in adjusting our bills. I am in favor and propose shortly to urge a measure which will relieve all these projects from unjust expenditures.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (at 3 o'clock p. m.). The hour has arrived at which the vote is to be taken under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. LODGE. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts will state his question of order.

Mr. LODGE. I call attention to the fact that this is a vote requiring two-thirds majority, and that under the practice of the Senate, Senators voting in the negative, or voting to sustain the message, are entitled to double pairs. That was the case in the veto message on the Fitz-John Porter bill and in connection with President Arthur's veto of the river and harbor bill. There have been cases, like the pension vetoes, during the administration of President Cleveland, where it was all one way and no point was made, but it has been the universal practice in regard to treaties, and I merely call attention to that fact before Senators vote. A Senator paired in the negative has a right to a double pair.

Mr. CUMMINS. I rise to a point of order also.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa will state his point of order.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is that the Senate has nothing to do with pairs. There is no rule which governs pairs, and therefore the subject is one that must be dealt with by individual Senators according to their own judgment of the case.

Mr. LODGE. That is quite true; but I wished to call the attention of individual Senators to the universal practice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair certainly has nothing to do with the matter. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BRISTOW. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not understand what the Senator from Massachusetts means by a Senator understanding that he must have a double pair. Suppose a Senator is paired, and he announces his pair and refrains from voting; how can he get a double pair unless there is some other Senator who volunteers to pair with him?

Mr. LODGE. Under the practice of the Senate, if he does not have a double pair, he is at liberty to vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. MYERS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	du Pont	Martin, Va.	Simmons
Bacon	Fall	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Fletcher	Massey	Smith, Mich.
Bourne	Gallinger	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Bradley	Gronna	Nelson	Smoot
Brandegee	Guggenheim	Newlands	Sutherland
Bristow	Heyburn	Overman	Swanson
Bryan	Hitchcock	Page	Thornton
Burton	Johnson, Me.	Penrose	Townsend
Catron	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Warren
Chamberlain	Jones	Poindexter	Watson
Clapp	Kenyon	Pomerene	Wetmore
Crane	Kern	Reed	Williams
Culberson	La Follette	Root	Works
Cullom	Lippitt	Sanders
Cummins	Lodge	Shively

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The roll will be called.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. He went away a few days ago, and I told him that he could rely on me to protect him. I certainly did not anticipate this situation, where I should be held by only one Senator when I was entitled to two on this occasion, where it requires a two-thirds vote. I do not know what entered into the other Senator's mind, but inasmuch as I have not notified him that he must come here and protect himself, I do not feel at liberty to vote. I therefore withhold my vote and protect my pair.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. I transfer it to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER], who is unavoidably detained, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], and in his absence, not having notified him of a situation like this coming up, I feel that I should protect him, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when Mr. OWEN's name was called). I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is paired with the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN]. I desire this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when Mr. PERCY's name was called). My colleague [Mr. PERCY] is absent upon important business, and is paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

Mr. DU PONT (when Mr. RICHARDSON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] is out of the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. If present, my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON], and in view of the statement made by his colleague [Mr. DU PONT] I withhold my vote. Were I at liberty, I should vote "yea."

Mr. REED (when Mr. STONE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. STONE] is necessarily absent, and is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], but under the arrangement which I have with that Senator, I am at liberty to vote on questions of this kind, where a two-thirds vote is required, when I vote in the negative, unless I am furnished with an additional pair. Not having been furnished with an additional pair, I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS]. I transfer it to the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WETMORE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BURNHAM. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], which I transfer to the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. CHILTON]. He is paired, as stated, with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. If present, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I announce a pair between the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. This is for the day.

The vote resulted—yeas 42, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—42.

Ashurst	Cummins	La Follette	Simmons
Bacon	Fall	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-two Senators have voted in the affirmative and 17 in the negative and the bill is passed, notwithstanding the objections of the President.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DU PONT submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 24450) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 10.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 11, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 11 of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment, after the word "hereafter," strike out the word "graduates" and insert in lieu the words "a graduate"; in line 13, after the word "from," strike out the words "West Point, New York" and insert in lieu the words "his home"; in line 14, after the word "which," strike out the words "they first join" and insert in lieu the words "he first joins"; and in line 14, beginning after the word

"duty," strike out all the rest of the amendment down to and including the word "strength" in line 28; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 3 of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment, after the word "sergeant," strike out the word "six" and insert in lieu the word "eight"; in line 4, after the word "sergeants," strike out the word "eight" and insert in lieu the word "ten"; in line 4, after the word "musicians," strike out the word "forty" and insert in lieu the word "thirty-eight"; and in line 5, after the word "and," strike out the word "forty" and insert in lieu the word "thirty-eight"; and the Senate agree to the same.

PREFERENCE RIGHT OF ENTRY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5309) to amend section 3 of the act of Congress approved May 14, 1880 (21 Stat. L., 140), which were, on page 1, line 7, to strike out "therefore," and on page 2, in line 24, and page 3, lines 1 and 2, to strike out "And provided further, That this act shall apply to all claims, locations, or entries made under the above-mentioned acts, where no adverse claims have intervened."

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BOURNE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 21279) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to ask for the regular order in order that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate, and then I will discuss with the Senator from Oregon the future proceeding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair overlooked the fact that the time had expired, and the Chair lays before the Senate at this point the unfinished business, which will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BOURNE. In asking for the unanimous consent, I had no desire at all to displace the canal bill. I had conferred with the Senator from Connecticut having the bill in charge, and it was with his agreement that I made the proposition.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is in accordance with my understanding of it, and I simply wanted to state that upon conferring with quite a number of Senators I found they were unanimously of the opinion that adjournment would be hastened by temporarily laying aside the unfinished business, being the Panama Canal bill, and passing the appropriation bill, so that it may get into conference committee at the earliest possible day, and be considered while the Panama Canal bill is being considered here. If unanimous consent can be had that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside, retaining its place as the unfinished business upon the calendar without prejudice until the Post Office appropriation bill can be acted upon by the Senate, I shall make that request. I do make that request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that under the rule the bill will come up automatically each day and that the Senate could not well make a continuing agreement as to it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, that order is made.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to state that I will make a similar request at the proper hour each day until the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 21279) is finally acted upon by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill? The Chair hears none.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads with amendments.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, the Post Office appropriation bill was passed by the House on May 2. In addition to carrying appropriations of over $260,000,000, it also contained more legislation of vital importance than any legislative bill I know of before Congress.

Believing that the Senate shares equal responsibility with the House on all bills of appropriation as well as legislation, the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads have carefully investigated every item and every legislative feature in the bill. The committee concluded its study on the evening of the 19th and authorized me to report to the Senate the bill now before this body.

During my five years of service in the Senate I have repeatedly been called upon to vote upon items in appropriation bills concerning which I had no information; nor had I the time to obtain it, but blindly followed the chairman of the committee or the opponents of the item or amendment, provided I had confidence in the individual. Such a condition is most irritating.

Believing that the fullest possible information concerning the subject under discussion is most desirable and must result in more intelligent legislation, I have taken the Post Office appropriation bill, dictated a brief explanatory note under each item and section, and had printed what I term an "information print," which is placed upon the desk of each Senator, together with the committee report on the bill. In the explanations I have endeavored as concisely as possible to show the reasons upon which the committee based its recommendations.

I believe the general adoption of this plan on all appropriation bills would be of great benefit to the Government, resulting in more intelligent legislation and economizing the time of the Senators and Representatives, though requiring far more work on the part of the chairman of every committee to which is referred any appropriation bill. However, this extra work on the part of 1 Senator must save the time of the other 95, and, in my opinion, will expedite legislation on the floor of the Senate.

The House bill contained direct appropriations aggregating $260,366,199. The bill now before the Senate, as recommended by the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, carries appropriations amounting to $271,126,320, showing an apparent increase of $10,760,121.

While section 9 of the bill increasing the compensation of rural carriers was adopted by the House, the House failed to make any increased appropriation, although its enactment into law would necessitate an increased expenditure of $4,386,900. The Senate committee disagreed to section 9 of the House bill and recommended an amendment to the appropriation for the compensation of rural carriers, increasing the maximum compensation $100 per annum and thereby increasing the appropriation $3,625,000 instead of $4,386,900, as would be required if the Senate agree to section 9 as passed by the House.

The House also failed to make any appropriation for section 5 of the House bill establishing an eight-hour day. The enactment of this section, as set forth in the House bill, would necessitate an additional appropriation of about $3,000,000. While a majority of the Senate committee agreed to section 5, they recommend postponing the time of operation to March 3, 1913, thus saving the Government $2,100,000 over the provision that would have been required by the enactment of said section as in the House bill.

In other words, had the House made the appropriations necessary to the carrying out of the provisions of the bill as passed by that body, the bill would have carried an appropriation of $267,753,099, instead of the $260,366,199 that it actually does carry. Thus in reality the recommended Senate increase over the House bill is only $3,373,231. The principal item of this increase is the $2,598,000 made necessary by the restoration to mail trains of that portion of second-class mail known as the "blue-tag" or freight service, and the further item of $750,000 appropriated in the Senate parcel-post service.

I suggest to Senators if they will consult the information print on their desks they will see the argument as the bill is read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

Mr. LODGE. The bill will be read for amendment, I suppose, at the same time? I suppose the usual course will be followed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That request has not been made.

Mr. BOURNE. I was going to ask unanimous consent that the Senate dispense with the first formal reading of the bill and proceed to the consideration of the committee amendments, but on talking over the matter with some Senators they seemed to think that better information could be received regarding the bill if the bill was read by the Clerk. I will ask the unanimous consent, and then any Senator who prefers to have it read of course can make objection.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the first formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that we proceed to the consideration of committee amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It seems to me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Georgia allow the Chair to put the request?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the first formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have hesitated about objecting to a custom that has been so uniform in the Senate, but I think that in reading the bill not only committee amendments but amendments to be proposed from the floor ought to be permitted as each section of the bill is read. With that modification I am ready to agree that unanimous consent be given.

Mr. LODGE. The request can be made in that way, that the bill may be read and that amendments be considered as the paragraphs are reached.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Oregon, in presenting the bill, made the statement that there is a considerable amount of legislation involved in the bill, and I think that is true. If amendments which involve new legislation are to be voted on at once, it seems to me that Senators would be at some disadvantage, particularly those who have not had the time to consider them. With that thought in mind, it does seem to me that if we were informed as to the entire contents of the bill we would be in a better position to consider the amendments. I do not like to object, but I confess that there are some amendments I am not prepared to vote upon this afternoon.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the reading of the bill in committee is not one of the regular readings necessary to make the bill a law. It is merely that any Senator has a right to ask for the reading of the bill. It is not strictly a first formal reading, because it is not required.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. One moment. Let me complete my statement. When a bill is read through from beginning to end without interruption and nothing is done, long habit shows that when a bill is read in that way from the desk, solidly, from beginning to end, nobody pays any attention to it. The practice has been adopted of making that the one reading, so that the amendments are taken up as reached, and if an amendment is an important one, upon which Senators desire to be present, it has always been the custom in the Senate to pass it over so that there could be due notice. But the long, unbroken habit of the Senate for many years, of reading the bill and having the amendments acted on as they are reached—whether not the amendments of the committee alone, but other amendments, is a secondary point—certainly leads to a better consideration of the bill than in any other way, because when the bill is read without interruption nobody pays attention to it. After that is done amendments can be offered to any part of the bill at any time.

Mr. POMERENE. When I endeavored to interrupt the Senator while he was speaking I was going to suggest that if the amendments which involve new legislation will be permitted to lie over on the request of a Senator, I would have no objection to the proceeding proposed.

Mr. LODGE. That has been the universal practice in considering bills of this sort.

Mr. BACON. I understand that the purpose is not to pass finally upon a paragraph when amendments have been adopted, but that we will proceed to the end of the bill, and under the liberal practice, which the Senator will recall was very much in vogue some years ago, on the request of any Senator the Senate will return to a paragraph for any additional amendment which may be suggested.

Mr. LODGE. I never knew about that practice, but I suppose amendments are to be dealt with as reached. We must have an end of legislation at some time.

Mr. BACON. I am not speaking of dealing with amendments as they are reached. I am speaking of the question whether or not Senators are precluded from the fact that amendments have been adopted to a paragraph from offering later additional amendments to the same paragraph.

Mr. LODGE. When an amendment is passed over of course we can return to it. If an amendment is dealt with we can reach it again in the Senate. Certainly we have enough methods of delaying matters in the Senate without multiplying them. Here is a bill read line by line, paragraph by paragraph. Each amendment is considered. If no Senator wishes to have it passed over it is dealt with and adopted or not, as the case may be. If we have the right to return and reconsider every amendment it protracts the consideration of the bill indefinitely.

Mr. BACON. The Senator in his earnestness entirely overlooks the suggestion which I made. I have not been making the suggestion as to going back to any paragraph which has been adopted, nor have I spoken of the case of a paragraph which has been passed over. I am simply suggesting that frequently there may be a paragraph to which certain amendments have been offered, and when they have been adopted, of course, they are final in that regard until the bill gets into the Senate. But before we get into the Senate it may occur that some additional amendments may be desired to certain paragraphs which have been thus acted upon. I am not seeking in any manner to disturb the action which has been taken.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, the bill is open to amendment, and a Senator can offer an amendment at any point in the bill after the reading has been concluded. The Senator understands that as well as I do.

Mr. BACON. I thought I understood it, and I said it would be followed as heretofore; and the contention——

Mr. LODGE. That is a right that can not be taken away.

Mr. BACON. I simply made the statement, and yet the Senator insisted upon contending——

Mr. LODGE. I did not understand that the Senator was contending for a right which nobody proposes to take away and which can not be taken away.

Mr. BACON. I simply wanted to know if that was recognized, and the Senator insisted upon making a contention about questions which I had not raised.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, undoubtedly if every Senator would stay in his seat and follow the bill as read it would be better to first have a formal reading of the bill and then go back and take up the Senate committee amendments, but, unfortunately, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said, between the little recesses of luncheon and other business which intervenes that is not always done.

We have lately tried both systems. More than a week ago we were at work upon a bill where we read it through, or nearly through, before we commenced to consider the amendments. It struck me then that there was more confusion in considering the committee amendments after that first reading than there would have been if we had read the bill in the usual way, omitting the formal reading and reading it for committee amendments, because in that way the bill is carefully read and a Senator who is watching it is led up to an amendment and usually understands it by the time he gets to it, whereas if there is a formal reading of the bill and after that we proceed direct to committee amendments and they are considered without further reading of the bill they are not so readily taken up and understood by Senators.

I think it is more convenient for Senators to dispense with the formal reading and have the committee amendments considered as they are reached. After we pass through the bill, of course we can turn back, or any amendment can be laid aside which any Senator wishes to consider further. Then it is open to add anything to any of the amendments, and even to amend the amendments themselves after we get into the Senate. So every kind of privilege is retained to the Senate should assent be given to dispense with the formal reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon modify his request along the line suggested by the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not desire to interpose any objection to the bill, but it is my purpose to object to a unanimous consent allowing simply committee amendments to be considered.

Mr. BOURNE. That was not the intention, I will say to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is my purpose when I am present on any bill in which I feel an interest, when numerous committee amendments are before the Senate, to withhold my consent from a unanimous-consent agreement that the bill shall be considered section by section, and that simply the committee amendment shall be considered.

I think that after the committee amendments are presented, while the section is fresh in the mind of the Senate, if any Senator desires to add an amendment it is far easier for him to do so at the time rather than to be cut off until the separate sections have ceased to have their separate consideration and the bill comes up for consideration as a whole.

I am perfectly willing as to this bill to give just the consent that the Senator in charge wishes, and I do not desire in presenting this new suggestion to interfere in any way with his bill, because I have not any amendment myself to suggest.

Mr. BOURNE. It is perfectly satisfactory that after the committee amendments are considered any Member of the Senate can offer to that section such amendments as he may have. I should like to have the unanimous-consent agreement, if made, so construed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the unanimous-consent agreement will be reached in that form and the reading of the bill will be commenced.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, under the subhead "Office of the Postmaster General," on page 3, line 2, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three" and insert "four," and in the same line, after the words "per day," to strike out "$261,400" and insert "$361,870," so as to make the clause read:

For per diem allowance of inspectors in the field while actually traveling on official business away from their home, their official domicile, and their headquarters, at a rate to be fixed by the Postmaster General, not to exceed $4 per day, $361,870.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 6, before the word "thousand," to strike out "thirty-one" and insert "forty-one," so as to make the clause read:

For traveling expenses of inspectors without per diem allowance, inspectors in charge, and the Chief Post Office Inspector, and expenses incurred by inspectors not covered by per diem allowance, unusual and extraordinary expenses necessarily incurred for maintenance by inspectors over and above per diem allowance while traveling on official business in the District of Alaska, and for the traveling expenses of two clerks performing stenographic and clerical assistance to post-office inspectors in the investigation of important fraud cases, $41,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 16, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five thousand" and insert "seven thousand five hundred," so as to make the clause read:

For necessary miscellaneous expenses at division headquarters, $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 2, to insert:

For printing, binding, and wrapping a revised edition of the Postal Laws and Regulations, such edition to be prepared under the direction of the Postmaster General and printed at the Government Printing Office and to consist of 110,000 copies, 5,000 of which shall be retained by the Public Printer for sale to individuals at the cost thereof and 10 per cent added, the proceeds of such sales to be deposited in the Treasury as provided by law, $55,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the purpose of compiling the above publication.

Mr. BACON. May I ask the Senator there what is the provision to be made for meeting the expenses necessary for compiling? I notice this proviso:

That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the purpose of compiling the above publications.

I simply ask for information what is the provision made for the expense necessary for that compiling?

Mr. BOURNE. That is in order that the compilation shall be done by the clerks in the Post Office Department. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that, in the opinion of the committee, there is great necessity for this new edition of the Postal Laws and Regulations. Some 750 amendments have been made since the last edition was printed and it is entirely out of date now.

Mr. WARREN. It is for the convenience, I understand, of postmasters and those who have to act under the law.

Mr. BOURNE. Yes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 17, page 6, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL.

For compensation to postmasters, $30,000,000.

For compensation to assistant postmasters at first and second class post offices, 5, at not exceeding $4,000 each; 38, at not exceeding $3,000 each; 6, at not exceeding $2,500 each; 6, at not exceeding $2,000 each; 16, at not exceeding $1,900 each; 40, at not exceeding $1,800 each; 81, at not exceeding $1,700 each; 131, at not exceeding $1,600 each; 155, at not exceeding $1,500 each; 141, at not exceeding $1,400 each; 341, at not exceeding $1,300 each; 528, at not exceeding $1,200 each; 480, at not exceeding $1,100 each; 176, at not exceeding $1,000 each; 135, at not exceeding $900 each; 125, at not exceeding $800 each; and 100, at not exceeding $700 each; in all, $3,000,000. And the appointment and assignment of assistant postmasters hereunder shall be so made during the fiscal year as not to involve a greater aggregate expenditure than this sum.

Mr. WARREN. I want to ask right there why there should be an increase in number there and a greater number employed. Would it be at the expense of the salary of the others? Would they have to be reduced? I notice there is a fixed sum.

Mr. BOURNE. It would have to be adjusted according to the number of employees. There would be no increase in the appropriation other than what is fixed in the item itself. It would be administrative and adjusted in accordance with the classification.

Mr. WARREN. The appropriation of $3,000,000 must govern?

Mr. BOURNE. Absolutely.

Mr. WARREN. And under that if you arrive at the maximum and further employees should be necessary they would have to be denied or some of them reduced.

Mr. BOURNE. I do not see how they could be reduced. Their salaries are fixed by law.

Mr. WARREN. Except where they have authority to employ not exceeding a certain number at not exceeding certain salaries.

Mr. BOURNE. Then they would have that latitude in the administration.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask the Senator if he thinks there is flexibility enough there to provide for an additional employee or at an advanced salary when they were up to the limit.

Mr. BOURNE. I do not believe that they reach the limit. I imagine deaths, removals, and so on provide places enough.

Mr. WARREN. I want to know whether there is margin enough in the appropriation of $3,000,000 to cover exigencies as they may arise?

Mr. BOURNE. I think that would be a departmental matter, and I am under the impression that they so consider it. Of course a matter of that kind is not one of policy but of administration to be provided for by departmental recommendation.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon a question for information. I notice in this paragraph all these salaries are fixed at a maximum; that is, they are not to exceed a certain amount. Does the department have the right arbitrarily to fix a salary at some amount greater than that?

Mr. BOURNE. Not according to my understanding.

Mr. BACON. What do the words "not exceeding" mean unless it may be less?

Mr. BOURNE. I think that is the language usually used. My impression is that the salaries and number of employees are fixed by law and that the administrative branch of the Government must conduct itself under the law as it is enacted.

Mr. BACON. I will state to the Senator that the inquiry was suggested to my mind by one expression in the explanatory note. The explanatory note says that this appropriation in the preceding section is—

Deemed necessary because of growth of service and lack of appropriations last year to pay adequate salaries.

Mr. BOURNE. That was——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment until I finish the statement, the use of the word "adequate" suggested to my mind that there must be some discretion somewhere or else there would be a deficiency. If it had said "sufficient to pay the prescribed salaries," I would have understood, of course, that it would be made under a deficiency bill, but when it said "adequate salaries" it would indicate, to my mind, that there had been payments made to cover all the cases, but that there was an authority to adjust the salaries to the total amount, and in that way possibly by less than the amount specified. That caused me to look at the phraseology of the section. I notice in each instance there is this phraseology:

For compensation to assistant postmasters at first and second class post offices, five, at not exceeding $4,000 each.

I, of course, ask for information because I do not understand why that language was used. It runs through the whole section. While it could not exceed $4,000 it might be less.

Mr. BOURNE. I will say to the Senator from Georgia they can not exceed the maximum amount, but I understand they have discretionary power to go under in some instances.

Mr. BACON. That is what impressed me.

Mr. BOURNE. It was to cover that provision exactly.

Mr. BACON. This is exercised by the Postmaster General, I understand?

Mr. BOURNE. So I understand.

Mr. BACON. By a specific provision of law or by a custom which has grown up?

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I will say that it has been the case since I have been acquainted with the department—something over 15 years—to have the language this way, and there are times when it is necessary or desirable that the maximum salary should not be paid, but as a rule this is the prevailing salary. I think it is better to leave it as it is.

Mr. BACON. I am not criticizing the language. I am simply trying to find out what it means.

Mr. WARREN. My inquiry was to preface an inquiry that I am going to make at a later point. I notice at a later point, where a large number of employees are provided "at not exceedings," and so forth, there is put down a footing. The question is, in some cases where there are provided salaries, whether the footing is to govern or whether the subdivisions as to salaries of the employees are to govern. I pass it now, but when I come to the other I want to bring the question up.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the First Assistant Postmaster General," on page 6, line 24, after the word "Auditors," to insert "and superintendents of mails," so as to make the clause read:

Auditors, and superintendents of mails, 7, at not exceeding $3,000.

Mr. LODGE. I suggest, at the bottom of page 6, line 25, after the word "dollars," there should be inserted the word "each."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 25, after the word "dollars," insert "each," so as to read:

Auditors, and superintendents of mails, 7, at not exceeding $3,000 each.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 1, before the word "superintendents," to insert "Assistant superintendents of mails," and in line 2, before the words "of delivery," to strike out "Superintendents" and insert "superintendents," so as to make the clause read:

Assistant superintendents of mails, superintendents of delivery, and superintendents of mails, 15, at not exceeding $2,700 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 5, before the word "Cashiers," to insert "Assistant superintendents of mails," and in line 6, before the word "superintendents," to strike out "Cashiers" and insert "cashiers," so as to make the clause read:

Assistant superintendents of mails, cashiers, superintendents of delivery, and superintendents of mails, 18, at not exceeding $2,600 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 9, before the word "Cashiers," to insert "Assistant superintendents of mails"; and in line 10, before the word "superintendents," to strike out "Cashiers" and insert "cashiers," so as to make the clause read:

Assistant superintendents of mails, cashiers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, and superintendents of stations, 21, at not exceeding $2,500 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 16, after the words "finance clerks," to strike out "private secretaries" and insert "stenographers," so as to make the clause read:

Assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendents of registry, bookkeepers, cashiers, finance clerks, stenographers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, and superintendents of registry, 35, at not exceeding $2,400 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 1, before the word "Cashiers," to insert "Assistant superintendents of mails"; and in line 2, before the word "chief," to strike out "Cashiers" and insert "cashiers," so as to make the clause read:

Assistant superintendents of mails, cashiers, chief stamp clerk, night superintendents, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of inquiry, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, and superintendents of registry, 20, at not exceeding $2,100 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 21, after the words "finance clerks," to strike out "private secretaries" and insert "stenographers," so as to make the clause read:

Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendents of registry, assistant superintendents of stations, bookkeepers, cashiers, chief mailing clerks, chief stamp clerks, examiners of stations, finance clerks, stenographers, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, superintendents of registry, superintendents of second-class matter, and superintendents of stations, 85, at not exceeding $1,800 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 8, after the words "finance clerks," to strike out "private secretaries" and insert "stenographers," so as to make the clause read:

Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendents of registry, assistant superintendents of stations, bookkeepers, cashiers, chief mailing clerks, chief stamp clerks, examiners of stations, finance clerks, stenographers, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, superintendents of registry, superintendents of second-class matter, and superintendents of stations, 140, at not exceeding $1,700 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 19, after the words "foremen of crews," to strike out "private secretaries" and insert "stenographers," so as to make the clause read:

Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendents of registry, assistant superintendents of stations, bookkeepers, cashiers, chief mailing clerks, chief stamp clerks, examiners of stations, finance clerks, foremen of crews, stenographers, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, superintendents of registry, superintendents of second-class matter, and superintendents of stations, 140, at not exceeding $1,600 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 6, after the words "foremen of crews," to strike out "private secretaries" and insert "stenographers," so as to make the clause read:

Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendents of registry, assistant superintendents of stations, bookkeepers, cashiers, chief mailing clerks, chief stamp clerks, examiners of stations, finance clerks, foremen of crews, stenographers, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, superintendents of registry, superintendents of second-class matter, and superintendents of stations, 258, at not exceeding $1,500 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 17, after the words "foremen of crews," to strike out "private secretaries" and insert "stenographers"; and, in line 21, after the words "superintendents of stations," to strike out "five hundred and sixty" and insert "nine hundred and forty-seven," so as to make the clause read:

Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendents of registry, assistant superintendents of stations, bookkeepers, cashiers, chief mailing clerks, chief stamp clerks, special clerks, examiners of stations, finance clerks, foremen of crews, stenographers, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, superintendents of registry, superintendents of second-class matter, and superintendents of stations, 947, at not exceeding $1,400 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 4, after the words "foremen of crews," to strike out "private secretaries"; and, in line 5, after the word "clerks," to insert "stenographers"; and, in line 9, after the word "thousand," to strike out "five hundred and four" and insert "seven hundred and seventeen," so as to make the clause read:

Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of registry, assistant superintendents of stations, bookkeepers, cashiers, chief mailing clerks, chief stamp clerks, examiners of stations, finance clerks, foremen of crews, special clerks, stenographers, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, superintendents of registry, superintendents of second-class matter, and superintendents of stations, 1,717, at not exceeding $1,300 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 15, after the words "foremen of crews," to strike out "private secretaries"; and, in line 18, after the word "stations," to strike out "sixteen thousand four hundred and seventy-nine" and insert "fourteen thousand five hundred and nineteen," so as to make the clause read:

Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendents of registry, assistant superintendents of stations, bookkeepers, chief stamp clerks, clerks, finance clerks, foremen of crews, stenographers, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of second-class matter, and superintendents of stations, 14,519, at not exceeding $1,200 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 21, after the word "clerks," to strike out "private secretaries"; and in line 24, after the word "stations," to strike out "six thousand seven hundred and forty" and insert "eight thousand one hundred," so as to make the clause read:

Assistant superintendents of stations, clerks, stenographers, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of second-class matter, and superintendents of stations, 8,100, at not exceeding $1,100 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 4, after the word "stations," to strike out "private secretaries," so as to make the clause read:

Assistant superintendents of stations, clerks, clerks in charge of stations, stenographers, superintendents of carriers, and superintendents of second-class matter, 3,000, at not exceeding $1,000 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 8, after the word "stations," to strike out "private secretaries," so as to make the clause read:

Clerks, clerks in charge of stations, and stenographers, 2,500, at not exceeding $900 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 16, after the word "pay," to insert "and for payment of services in excess of eight hours," so as to make the clause read:

Substitutes for clerks and employees absent without pay, and for payment of services in excess of eight hours.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I think the Senate should disagree to that amendment. I do not think the department ought to recognize overtime in the postal service. That department has not recognized overtime for a number of years, and it ceased to recognize overtime because of the very great abuses arising from the practice. A number of years ago the department paid about three and a half million dollars to letter carriers for overtime during a period covering about three years, and the provisions in the bill recognizing overtime simply invite the making of overtime by employees in the postal service. It will result in a number of employees, carriers and clerks, working overtime, and their salaries will thereby become increased. Nobody can tell what the amount will be, but in the course of years it will entail upon the Government very great expense.

Then, again, in our post offices there are substitute clerks and substitute letter carriers. When there is more work than the regular carriers can do the substitutes are called upon. Thereby they are permitted to earn something, which makes the position of a substitute more desirable, and they acquire experience which equips them for taking the place of the regular employees when the time comes for them to be regularly appointed. I sincerely trust that the Senate will refuse to recognize overtime in the postal service. It will be a very dangerous proposition, and it is one from which the Government receded years ago because of the abuses that arose under it.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, I ask my friend, the Senator from Kansas, if his remarks are not directed rather against the second paragraph of section 5? The proposed Senate committee amendment on page 12, line 17, is necessary and appropriate if section 5 be enacted.

Mr. BRISTOW. No; I do not think it is necessary, even if section 5 is enacted. Section 5 will, of course, necessitate the employment of additional help in order to attend to the Government's business.

Mr. BOURNE. But the second paragraph of section 5 applies to overtime compensation, and this amendment is put in here on the assumption that section 5, as passed by the other House and recommended by a majority of the committee of the Senate, will be enacted into law, and would then require this amendment on page 12, line 17. It is supplemental to the other.

Mr. BRISTOW. If there is no provision in the appropriation bill authorizing payment for overtime they can not employ these clerks overtime; they will have to employ the substitutes to do the work instead of having regular employees work overtime. I think that this amendment should go out, and the other provision also, but even if the other does not go out, then it would stop the evil if the appropriation for this purpose is cut out.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Kansas if it would not be necessary to adopt the committee amendment on page 12, line 17, providing the second paragraph of section 5, to which he makes objection, remains in the bill?

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, of course, that provision recognizes the fact that the clerks may work excessive hours and I think that ought to be amended, but at the same time that does not necessarily call for an appropriation. That merely gives the authority, but if the appropriation does not authorize overtime the overtime could not be made.

Mr. BOURNE. If section 5 be enacted it specifically provides for compensation for overtime, and this proposed amendment simply relates to that.

Mr. BRISTOW. Of course this is the first place where the question of overtime arises in the bill, and I think we should meet it now, because it is a grave danger and the experience of the Post Office Department in the past demonstrates that overtime should not be permitted. Then, the whole trend of modern industrial affairs is against allowing overtime, because more employment is afforded by doing away with it.

We passed an eight-hour law. What was the purpose of that law if not to limit the term of employment to eight hours a day? We have provided for an eight-hour day, a very great limitation, and now we are undertaking to pass a bill authorizing the violation of the eight-hour law. That is what it does. It is an utter inconsistency if we are going to stand for the principle of the eight-hour law.

Mr. BOURNE. As I understand, the Senator's objection is not to the financial reward or payment for overtime, but to overtime being allowed?

Mr. BRISTOW. I am against overtime; yes.

Mr. BOURNE. Then the Senator's objection is really to the second paragraph of section 5 rather than to this particular amendment, which, as I understand, is necessary, provided the whole of section 5, as it came from the other House, is enacted into law.

Mr. BRISTOW. I can not agree with the Senator that this amendment is necessary, even if section 5 stands unchanged. Rejecting the amendment simply refuses to appropriate any money to pay for overtime. The appropriation to which I am objecting is the one providing money to pay for overtime. I think the other clause ought also to be stricken out, but even if that is not stricken out, this one should be.

Mr. BOURNE. I would suggest that we let this amendment go over and not act on it now.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am perfectly willing that that shall be done.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to ask a question to see if I understand the Senator correctly. As I understand the Senator, it is not proposed by this amendment to make the hours of labor longer?

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, no.

Mr. WARREN. But it is to employ men eight hours a day only, and then not to pay them for overtime, but instead to employ substitutes and thus not debar others from employment. Is that correct?

Mr. BRISTOW. That is exactly right. The regular employee will work overtime and do the work, and the substitute will never have anything to do. We are pretending to observe the eight-hour law, but are not doing so.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I want to ask the Senator if he does not think that in many instances where there is no substitute a little overtime—say, half an hour—can be made by a clerk in the discharge of his duty, and that the clerk ought to be allowed something for it? It is really immaterial.

Mr. BRISTOW. There are substitutes everywhere, I think. I do not think there is any place where there are not substitutes. This proposition is a violation of the whole principle of the eight-hour law.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I presume substitutes are not standing around a post office all the time, and, unless a clerk is allowed to work overtime on occasions, he may lose the opportunity of making up mails and expediting operations of that kind while hunting for a substitute.

Mr. BRISTOW. There is not now any provision for overtime service where the eight-hour law applies.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I suppose employment over the eight hours is voluntary on the part of an employee? He can not be made to work overtime against his will?

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, the employee, of course, will want to work 9 or 10 hours; he will want to work more than 8 hours, if he has nothing else to do, because he will thereby receive more pay.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. The Senator would not save anything at all if he is giving it to some one else.

Mr. BRISTOW. The whole purpose of the amendment is to permit the employee to work more than eight hours.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to the fact that the overtime provided for under section 5 is only in case of emergency; it is not a general premium that is held out, and the Senate committee amendment would only be applicable to the emergency, as stated in the second clause, section 5.

Mr. BRISTOW. This provision is not for an emergency. There will be no emergencies in the future that have not occurred in the past; the department is getting along now and has done so for years without any overtime, while the eight-hour limit is imposed. There is no occasion to open it up again.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas to state to what class of employees this amendment applies? Does it propose to change the eight-hour rule as applied all over the United States?

Mr. BRISTOW. All over the United States; yes. It is proposed to apply to clerks and carriers in all the post offices of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does it apply also to the department here?

Mr. BRISTOW. No.

Mr. BOURNE. I will say for the information of the Senator from Georgia, and with the permission of the Senator from Kansas, that it applies to letter carriers in the City Delivery Service and to the clerks in first and second class post offices, according to section 5 as found in the House bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That was my impression, and I only wanted it stated, so that it would be clear.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it proposed to apply this provision to the railway postal clerks?

Mr. BOURNE. I will say to the Senator——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is not claimed that railway postal clerks are under the eight-hour law at present?

Mr. BOURNE. This amendment refers to the City Delivery Service and to mail clerks in first and second class post offices. It does not apply to the railway mail clerks.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was asking for information whether the railway mail clerks were protected by such a provision.

Mr. BOURNE. They are not, in my opinion.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Because I have complaints, which I desire to bring up at the proper time, by some five or six railway mail clerks running into and out of Omaha, who have been temporarily demoted and subjected to penalties from which they are still suffering—some $200 a year in salary—because they protested against being compelled to work 16 hours a day.

Mr. BOURNE. That will come up under another section; that is in a later part of the bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will call it up at the proper time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over for the present.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 12, line 18, before the words "per cent," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "fifty," and in line 20, before the words "per cent," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "fifty," so as to make the clause read:

And to provide for the promotion of 50 per cent of the clerks in first-class post offices from the fifth to the sixth grade and for the promotion of 50 per cent of the clerks in second-class offices from the fourth to the fifth grade.

Mr. WARREN. I want to ask the Senator about that. Did the committee in that instance think that the House was too liberal in the matter of promotions?

Mr. BOURNE. No; I will say to the Senator from Wyoming that the idea of the committee was that better service and greater efficiency would be obtained by giving a larger opportunity for promotion in the higher grades than in the lower grades, as the House bill provided. The provision of the House bill for the promotion of 75 per cent of the number of certain clerks would allow promotions from the $1,000 grade to the $1,100 grade in second-class offices and from $1,100 to $1,200 in first-class offices, and it was the opinion of the Senate committee that better service and greater efficiency would accrue by increasing the number of promotions in the $1,300 and $1,400 grades rather than in the $1,100 and $1,200 places, leaving the 50 per cent provision to apply to the lower grades, as it does at present.

Mr. WARREN. That appears in another paragraph?

Mr. BOURNE. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I want to ask the Senator, if I may be permitted to do so, another question. In lines 23 and 24, on page 12, the total of $37,878,000 has been reduced by the committee, I presume because of the reduction in the paragraph above?

Mr. BOURNE. Yes; because of the changes.

Mr. WARREN. That paragraph is preceded by a long list of clerks and operators whose salaries it is provided shall not exceed a certain sum. Then the total is made up. The total does not in this instance contain the language found on page 6. I assume that it is purposely left out, and is made to read simply, "In all, $37,750,000," which would not cover it, provided the preceding paragraphs amounted to more than that; but I wondered if there was any reason for the restriction in the one case and not in the other. The Senator will see in both cases that if there is an iron-clad rule that the clerks shall not exceed a certain number, and if you figure it up to that number and insert that as a total—and I do not know what other basis you would predicate the total on—you then could not increase the number of clerks or their compensation in any way without taking the money from some other place.

Mr. BOURNE. I will say to the Senator that the point he makes did not come up in the discussion in the Senate committee; that we adopted the amendment in the language of the House provision.

Mr. WARREN. Without going through and adding it up to see whether it amounted to the same or not?

Mr. BOURNE. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. If my estimate is correct, this is about $2,000,000 short.

Mr. BOURNE. As I understand, if this were passed as it is the Treasury Department would set that amount aside, and the Post Office Department, in its operations, would be bound by the provisions of law, so the result would be that there might be an excess of appropriations of $3,000,000, but it could not be utilized in any way under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. WARREN. In that case this $37,750,000, which is as near the total as you could get it, would not really control.

Mr. BOURNE. That is my opinion, but the Senator is a far better judge of that than I am, with his long experience on the Appropriations Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 12, line 24, before the word "thousand," to strike out "eight hundred and seventy-eight" and insert "seven hundred and fifty," so as to read:

In all, $37,750,000.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I ask that the amendments proposed by the committee on page 12, from lines 18 to 24, inclusive, providing for the promotion of 50 instead of 75 per cent of the clerks in first-class post offices, and the amendments pertaining thereto, be passed over for the time being.

Mr. BOURNE. That is perfectly agreeable to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the votes whereby the amendments were agreed to will be reconsidered, and they will be passed over for the present.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 13, line 10, before the word "hundred," to strike out "one" and insert "two"; and in line 12, before the word "hundred," to strike out "seven" and insert "six," so as to make the clause read:

For compensation to watchmen, messengers, and laborers, 200, at $840 each; 700, at $720 each; and 600, at $600 each; in all, $1,008,000. And the appointment and assignment of watchmen, messengers, and laborers hereunder shall be so made during the fiscal year as not to involve a greater aggregate expenditure than this sum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 4, before the word "hundred," to strike out "three" and insert "eight," and in the same line, before the word "thousand," to insert "and fifty," so as to make the clause read:

For temporary and auxiliary clerk hire at first and second class post offices and temporary and auxiliary clerk hire at summer and winter resort post offices, $850,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 8, to strike out:

For allowance to third-class post offices to cover the cost of clerical services in offices where the salaries of the postmasters range from $1,000 to $1,500, $580,000: Provided, That no allowance in excess of $200 shall be made where the salary of the postmaster is $1,000, $1,100, or $1,200; nor in excess of $300 where the salary of the postmaster is $1,300, $1,400, or $1,500.

For allowance to third-class post offices to cover the cost of clerical services in offices where the salaries of the postmasters range from $1,600 to $1,900, $750,000: Provided, That no allowance in excess of $400 shall be made where the salary of the postmaster is $1,600 or $1,700, nor in excess of $500 where the salary of the postmaster is $1,800 or $1,900.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For allowances to third-class post offices to cover the cost of clerical services, $1,725,000: Provided, That no allowance in excess of $300 shall be made where the salary of the postmaster is $1,000, $1,100, or $1,200; nor in excess of $400 where the salary of the postmaster is $1,300, $1,400, or $1,500; and that no allowance in excess of $500 shall be made where the salary of the postmaster is $1,600 or $1,700; nor in excess of $800 where the salary of the postmaster is $1,800 or $1,900: And provided further, That the Postmaster General may, in the disbursement of this appropriation, expend not exceeding $400,000 for the employment, at a maximum salary of $600 per annum, of assistant postmasters at post offices of the third class where the salary of the postmaster is $1,800 or $1,900 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 5, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five hundred" and insert "six hundred," so as to read:

For rent, light, and fuel for first, second, and third class post offices, $4,600,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, after line 4, to insert:

For additional labor-saving mechanical devices necessary for the economical handling and distribution of the mail matter in the post office at Chicago, $12,000 to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, may I recur to an amendment adopted a few moments ago to ask a question? My attention was diverted at the time. I am asking this not to criticize, but for information. On page 22 of the "information print" of the bill, where there is a provision for an appropriation of $1,725,000, I want to inquire of the Senator from Oregon whether that takes the place of anything else or whether it is a new item altogether?

Mr. BOURNE. One what page?

Mr. BACON. It is on page 22 of the "information print." It is an amendment which covers that entire page.

The question I wish to ask the Senator is whether that appropriation of $1,725,000 is an appropriation originally provided for in some other part of the bill and transferred to this part of the bill, or is it an additional amount?

Mr. BOURNE. The appropriation contained in the italicized portion of the bill on page 22 of the "information print," between line 5 and line 24, and lines 1 and 2, is the combination of paragraphs 50 and 51, on page 21.

Mr. BACON. That is, it is not really an addition, but is simply putting the matter in another shape?

Mr. BOURNE. It is perfecting it and putting it in better shape, in the opinion of the committee.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 17, after line 8, to insert:

The Postmaster General is hereby authorized to pay, in his discretion, rewards to postal employees whose inventions are adopted for use in the postal service, and for that purpose the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated: Provided, That not to exceed $1,000 shall be paid for one invention.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will let that amendment go over.

Mr. BOURNE. With great pleasure, if the Senator so requests.

Mr. GRONNA. I refer to the amendment on page 17, from lines 9 to 14, inclusive.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator from Oregon will pardon me, I want to suggest that there may be some legislation—I do not know how far it is advanced—pending before the Committee on Patents which would render adoption of this amendment unnecessary. I repeat, I am not certain as to the extent of the progress of the proposed legislation.

Mr. BOURNE. I will say to the Senator that if that legislation is in such a stage that this amendment should be unnecessary, I should be very glad to have it go out; and if it is not, the committee is of the opinion that it should certainly remain in the bill.

Mr. CLAPP. I did not know that the Senator was aware of that legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be passed over for the present.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 17, line 16, after the word "pay," to insert "and for services in excess of eight hours"; in line 17, before the words "per cent," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "fifty"; in line 19, before the words "per cent," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "fifty"; and in line 23, before the word "dollars," to strike out "eight hundred and two thousand one hundred and seventy-five" and insert "seven hundred and forty thousand," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of letter carriers at offices already established, including substitutes for letter carriers absent without pay, and for services in excess of eight hours, and for the promotion of 50 per cent of the letter carriers in first-class post offices from the fifth to the sixth grade and for the promotion of 50 per cent of the letter carriers in second-class offices from the fourth to the fifth grade; City Delivery Service, $32,740,000.

Mr. BRISTOW. Since a similar amendment on page 11 went over, I think that amendment on page 17, and also the one beginning in line 4, on page 18, ought to go over, as they both relate to the same matter.

Mr. BOURNE. I will say that I shall be very glad to have them go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be passed over.

Mr. BOURNE. The amendments relate to the eight-hour service.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. BOURNE. And to the provisions in regard to the promotion of letter carriers.

Mr. BRISTOW. The language in line 17, on page 17, refers to the eight-hour service.

Mr. BOURNE. Yes; but there are two or three other amendments in the section.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask that the amendment regarding promotions of letter carriers go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 1, after the word "million," to strike out "one" and insert "six," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of substitutes for letter carriers absent with pay, and of auxiliary and temporary letter carriers at offices where city delivery is already established, $1,600,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 4, after the words "letter carriers," to insert "and for services in excess of eight hours," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of letter carriers, substitute and auxiliary letter carriers, and for services in excess of eight hours at offices where City Delivery Service is established, during the year, $50,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be passed over.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 7, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "seventy-five," so as to make the clause read:

For horse-hire allowance and the rental of vehicles, $975,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 9, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four hundred and seventy-five" and insert "five hundred," so as to make the clause read:

For car fare and bicycle allowance, $500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 17, after the word "purchase," to insert "and exchange," and in line 18, before the word "maps," to insert "for the purchase of," so as to make the clause read:

For incidental expenses of the City Delivery Service, including freight and drayage on equipment, furniture, and supplies, and erecting, painting, and repairing letter and package boxes and posts, repairing clocks and other equipment, and for the purchase and exchange of time recorders and for the purchase of maps, $35,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 22, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five hundred and fifty" and insert "six hundred," so as to make the clause read:

For fees to special-delivery messengers, $1,600,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading was continued to the end of line 6 on page 19.

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to ask the Senator whether he is familiar enough with the history of this matter to know whether this proviso was in former bills or was inserted in the bill by the House:

That the proviso at the end of section 233 of the Postal Laws and Regulations be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"Provided, however, That this provision shall not apply to the city of Cambridge, Mass., or to Towson, Md., or to Clayton, St. Louis County, Mo."

Mr. LODGE. It is all explained in this statement here.

Mr. BOURNE. I will say for the information of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]——

Mr. CLAPP. It is not explained in the copy of the bill I have.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator has not the "information print,"

Mr. CLAPP. I have the calendar print.

Mr. ROOT. Get the "informatiion print."

Mr. LODGE. Give the Senator an "information print."

Mr. BOURNE. For the information of the Senator from Minnesota I will say——

Mr. CLAPP. I am asking for information, if the Senator knows, whether this was existing law before the bill passed the House or whether it was put into the bill in the House. I do not desire to make any point. I am simply asking for information.

Mr. BOURNE. If the Senator will permit me, I will try to the best of my ability to give him the information.

Every county seat must have a regular post office. Now, heretofore, Cambridge, Mass., preferred to have Boston its regular post office. Towson prefers to have Baltimore as her regular post office. The House has provided that Clayton, in St. Louis County, may have St. Louis as its regular post office, and these others simply become substations.

Mr. CLAPP. That is not the point at all. I am not objecting to the legislation, but I desire to know whether the chairman knows if this has been in former bills or if it was put in the bill for the first time in the House.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Oregon will allow me, Cambridge being in my State, I will state that this has been carried in the post-office bills for some years. The amendment simply adds Clayton, Mo.

Mr. ROOT. That is stated in the explanation.

Mr. LODGE. The other two have been carried for years in this way because Cambridge has been for a good many years within the Boston metropolitan district.

Mr. CLAPP. Then Clayton was added in the House?

Mr. LODGE. Clayton, Mo., was added, and it is taken up at St. Louis.

Mr. CLAPP. That is what I desired to know.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the Second Assistant Postmaster General," on page 19, line 17, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty thousand" and insert "fifty-three thousand seven hundred," so as to make the clause read:

For inland transportation by steamboat or other power-boat routes, $853,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 19, line 19, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty thousand" and insert "eighty-one thousand nine hundred," so as to make the clause read:

For mail messenger service, $1,681,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, line 22, after the word "dollars," to insert:

Provided, That a commission consisting of two members of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, United States Senate, and two members of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, House of Representatives, to be appointed by the chairmen of the respective committees, and the Second Assistant Postmaster General, is hereby authorized to investigate the feasibility and desirability of the Government purchasing and operating the equipment for pneumatic-tube service in the cities in which such service is now installed, together with rights to operate and extend equipment in such cities and elsewhere, and to ascertain the cost at which such purchase may be made. The employment of expert and other assistance is authorized, and the expense of such and of the inquiry shall be paid from the appropriation for service by pneumatic tubes, and said commission shall make a report, with recommendations, to Congress at the earliest practicable date.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 19, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "eighty-two," so as to make the clause read:

For mail bags, metal for mail-bag attachments, cord fasteners, label cases, and material necessary for manufacture and repairing of equipment, and for incidental expenses pertaining thereto, $282,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 7, before the word "thousand," to insert "and two," so as to make the clause read:

For compensation to labor employed in the mail-bag repair shop at Washington, D. C., and Chicago, Ill., $102,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 21, after the words "railroad routes," to strike out "$47,646,000" and insert "$50,036,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 22, after the amendment just agreed to, to insert:

Provided, That all second-class mail shall have the benefit of the same facilities and shall receive the same treatment, without discrimination against any portion thereof, in respect to speed of transportation, the purpose being to reestablish the system in vogue prior to the establishment of the blue-tag system: Provided further, That the transportation of second-class matter in fast freight trains and the manner of handling incident thereto shall be discontinued after August 31, 1912, and thereafter shall be carried in the regular mail trains, and the Postmaster General is authorized to readjust the compensation from September 1, 1912, for the remainder of the term for which adjustments have been made on the railroad routes affected, upon a weighing of the mails as provided by law.

Mr. BACON. Is this a new provision of law?

Mr. BOURNE. This is a provision put into the bill for the purpose of putting all second-class matter under the same service. It is to reestablish conditions existing prior to what is known as the blue-tag service, whereby part of the magazines and periodicals are sent by freight and part by fast mail. It was the opinion of the committee, in the discussion of this paragraph, that citizens paying the same price were entitled to the same service, and that it was a most dangerous power to give to any member of the Government the right to discriminate as between individual or between classifications provided by law when the payments were the same.

It will cost the Government probably nearly $3,000,000 to reinstate conditions existing prior to the initiation of the blue-tag system. The committee felt that the department in their efforts toward economy were to be commended, but that it could not defend the judgment of the department in initiating or attempting to initiate discrimination between individuals making the same payment; it thought they were entitled to the same service.

The purpose of this amendment of the committee is simply to bring about those conditions by which citizens paying the same price shall receive the same service.

Mr. POMERENE. What was the discriminations to which the Senator refers?

Mr. BOURNE. It was that part of the second-class matter, the payment to the Government being the same in all instances, a cent per pound, was autocratically by the Post Office Department sent without the consent of the publisher by freight, and another large portion going by fast mail.

There were a series of hearings held before the committee; a number of individuals were heard who were affected by this system, and it was demonstrated clearly to the satisfaction of the committee that great delays occur. It was also demonstrated that it was impossible for any individual to make a classification that would be just.

We had before the committee illustrations of periodicals that, in the opinion of the committee, carried relatively the same matter, of the same importance, where part was sent by freight and part was sent by fast mail. It was to correct that that this amendment of the committee was submitted to the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I want to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether the mail that was sent by freight was sent without the consent of the publishers?

Mr. BOURNE. According to my recollection of the hearings, I will state that in a number of instances it was. In some instances I think it was assented to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would not this, perhaps, more aptly express it: The department required quite a large class of this mail to go by blue tag, by freight; a number protested; some obeyed the order of the department without serious protest?

Mr. BOURNE. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It could hardly be said that the actual consent had been obtained from any considerable portion of the periodicals that were sent by freight. We had a very aggressive protest on the part of some magazines that were being sent by blue tag, by freight, and we had also before us at our committee meeting publications that seemed to be exactly of the same character, some of which, under the classification of the department, required to go by freight, while others were allowed to go by fast mail, the compensation to the Government being exactly the same in each case.

The real trouble about this second-class mail matter is that it all goes too cheaply. It goes at a very great loss to the Government, and the effort by the Post Office Department was to try to save some of this loss, and it seemed it could be sent by freight at about half the cost that it was to the Government when sent by fast mail.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may inquire, what was the purpose of the department in not sending it all by freight and thus avoiding any discrimination between publishers, for instance, if such was the case?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the department undertook to classify the publications by the rule of news, the theory of the department being that such magazines as did not carry news were not in a position where it was especially important to them to have a delivery with such great promptness; and, so far as I could gather, the department sought to say that those publications which were especially dependent upon the news and to which it was especially important that prompt delivery should be made, should be put into the mail service, and that those which seemed to be in a condition where it was not essential that they should have very prompt delivery, and where two or three days' difference in five or six hundred miles or a thousand miles carriage, in the opinion of the department, would amount to little, they classified for freight.

But I did not mean to take the Senator from Oregon off his feet. I was just going to make a single suggestion.

Mr. PAGE. May I inquire of the chairman of the committee about what the difference in time is in the transportation of this matter, say, from New York to Chicago via freight and via mail?

Mr. BOURNE. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that there was a case before the committee where an apparent delay of nine days in delivery occurred, due to sending it by freight instead of by the regular mail. There were some instances, but I can not state the specific instances now; but, as I remember, the case I cited was one of the extreme cases.

Mr. PAGE. I was not asking for extreme cases, but, rather, what the general rule of delivery was as between these two means of transportation.

Mr. BOURNE. I do not think they had sufficient data to enable them to give very reliable information on that. The committee took the broad viewpoint, the basic viewpoint, that citizens making the same payment for service were entitled to equal service.

Mr. PAGE. I suppose the change was made in order to make a saving in the expense of transportation. How much was saved per annum because of this change?

Mr. BOURNE. It was the opinion of the department that in a year's operation and its general adoption the Government would save, as I remember, about two and one-half million dollars.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, it seems to me that in this amendment under consideration the committee, in trying to remedy an evil, goes too far. The amendment compels magazines published once a month to be sent through the mails with the same speed, the same facilities, that a daily paper is afforded, and it makes it imperative upon the department to put a monthly magazine, for which a week or 10 days would be ample time for it to reach its destination, on the same fast trains, with the same facilities, and the same method of distribution given a newspaper.

It seems to me that is going too far. I think that that should not be compulsory on the department. A daily paper is worth nothing unless it reaches its destination the same day or the day after it is published. A magazine may come a week afterwards. The proviso on page 21 reads:

> That all second-class mail shall have the benefit of the same facilities and shall receive the same treatment, without discrimination against any portion thereof, in respect to speed of transportation, the purpose being to reestablish the system in vogue prior to the establishment of the blue-tag system.

Now, unless the purpose is to give a magazine the same speed, the same rapidity, in delivery to its subscribers that a daily paper has, that proviso is unnecessary. The provision following gets rid of the blue-tag system, which makes a discrimination between magazines, shipping one magazine by freight and another magazine by the mail. It would seem to me that if what I have read was eliminated and if the Post Office Department was not compelled, as it would be by that provision, to see that a magazine, when it is put in the mail, shall go as quickly and shall as promptly reach its destination as does a newspaper, and if the other clause is retained, the trouble that is complained of would be gotten rid of:

> That the transportation of second-class matter in fast freight trains and the manner of handling incident thereto shall be discontinued after August 31, 1912, and thereafter shall be carried in the regular mail trains.

That is the provision which gets rid of the trouble complained of. That provision is ample to accomplish that purpose, and it does not seem to me necessary, in order to get rid of an evil that exists, that we should here compel a magazine to go on the same fast train, to be carried as promptly, and delivered as promptly, as is the case with a daily paper.

Again, it seems to me the committee should not make it compulsory to send all magazines in the mail, when frequently the publishers are willing to have them sent on freight trains. I think it would be sufficient to provide that magazines should be so sent when desired by those offering the second-class matter. It costs about five or six times as much to handle them through the mails as it does on freight trains.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Twice as much.

Mr. SWANSON. More than twice as much.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The evidence before us in the case is that it costs us about twice as much on the fast mail as it does on the freight, but it costs about three to four times as much even on the freight as the Government charges for it.

Mr. SWANSON. It seems to me a provision permitting it to be done, if the magazine publishers are willing for it to go by freight, would be sufficient. Why should we have a provision compelling the department to send it by mail when it costs twice as much?

Mr. BOURNE. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. BOURNE. Can the Senator imagine any publisher of his own volition preferring that his publication should go by freight when it could go by fast mail at the same price?

Mr. SWANSON. The department says there are a great many people who are willing for their publications to go by freight, because there is a clamor in this country on account of the loss entailed by the Government on second-class mail matter, and some persons are willing, in order to get rid of that clamor, to have their publications sent by freight. But I think the option should be put there to send it by freight if desired, and not compel the department to send it by mail at twice the cost. What is the objection to putting in the option?

Mr. BOURNE. Will the Senator allow me again?

Mr. SWANSON. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. BOURNE. If your contention is correct, the Government would be put to the expense of maintaining a freight service as well as a fast-mail service in order to take care of those individuals who were willing to take a slower service, although they paid for and were entitled to the faster service.

Mr. SWANSON. The Government would not be put to any expense for the freight trains, except to pay the railroads for shipping it. The department could require the patron to express a preference, and if he expressed a preference for the mail, the magazines could go by mail. But I do not see why you should compel the department to send it by mail when some of the patrons are willing to have it sent by freight.

Mr. BOURNE. Would not the two services have to be established? Would not the department be obliged to make arrangements with the transportation companies by which they would have fast-mail facilities and freight facilities?

Mr. SWANSON. It would have its fast-mail facilities, and then if you have a number of carloads to go by freight, it would be shipped like any other freight is shipped. The service could be easily obtained and easily provided.

Mr. BOURNE. Then the Senator's idea is that it would come in like so many bags of potatoes or wheat or any commodity of that kind?

Mr. SWANSON. It would come in precisely the same as all freight comes in, except that it would be better taken care of.

Mr. BOURNE. But special arrangements would have to be made for the two services to be maintained.

Mr. SWANSON. One has to make arrangements for a carload of anything that I ever heard of that is to go by freight.

Mr. BOURNE. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. I have never yet known anybody to go to the depot and wait for a fast train to ship a carload of anything.

Mr. BOURNE. But in the case of the Government there is an activity continuing over the whole of the year.

Mr. SWANSON. Whenever a publisher expresses a desire or willingness to have his publications go through by freight for that year—in a case, for instance, where he publishes two weeks ahead of the time of issuance—why should the department be prohibited from doing it?

It seems that a great many publishers have been cooperating with the department to save the loss entailed by second-class mail matter. I think the Government should not be permitted to discriminate and send some by freight and some by mail; but if some publishers are willing to send their matter by freight in order to save the Government, and to that extent allay the clamor because of the great loss entailed on the Government by second-class matter, I do not see why it should not be left optional with them to do so. Let the option extend both to the Government and to the publisher. It seems to me there is an opportunity to broaden this.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, is not the way to work out the option to modify it to this extent—to permit the continuation in one sense of the blue-tag freight, and put the price at 2 cents for similar publications going by the fast mail, and then let them have the option? If you give an option to a person without a difference of price, will not everybody take the best?

My own suggestion did not meet with great favor in the committee, and, indeed, it did not seem to meet with special favor on the part of any of the publishers. It was that the publishers of these periodicals, not published like newspapers but published quarterly or monthly or less often than once a week, should have the option to have their publications either go on the fast mail or by the blue-tag service, and let the department continue with the blue-tag service at the very low charge of 1 cent and let the magazines go in the fast mail at 2 cents.

The fast mail costs the Government just twice as much—so the evidence indicated to us—and the proof before us tended to show that the fast-mail service is costing the Government on second-class matter about 7 cents where we charge 1, and that the blue-tag service costs about 3½ cents. That was the evidence submitted before the committee.

I was very much astonished at the figures, but that, I am sure the records will indicate, was the evidence furnished by the department to us. That would be a very simple solution of it, but I do not offer it as an amendment, because I have never found anybody who was willing to vote with me for it.

Mr. SWANSON. I am going to offer this amendment, because the department thinks most of these publishers would ultimately be satisfied by the freight system and especially as there has been an agitation in the country to increase the rate on second-class matter. On page 22, at the end of line 7, after the words "mail trains," I move to insert the words "when desired by those offering the same."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 22, line 7, after the words "mail trains," at the end of the line, insert "when desired by those offering the same," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided further, That the transportation of second-class matter in fast freight trains and the manner of handling incident thereto shall be discontinued after August 31, 1912, and thereafter shall be carried in the regular mail trains, when desired by those offering the same, and the Postmaster General is authorized to readjust the compensation from September 1, 1912, for the remainder of the term for which adjustments have been made on the railroad routes affected, upon a weighing of the mails as provided by law.

Mr. SWANSON. That is second-class matter.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Virginia will not insist upon an amendment of that kind. The truth is that there are none of the publishers who want their magazines to go by freight. There were a number who, rather than antagonize the department, consented to send them that way, but they did not want them to go that way, and if left to their choice none of them will go that way.

All who are familiar with the character of the fast-mail service and the importance of the service in the circulation of periodicals know that no publisher will want to put his magazines on a freight train when his competitors would send them by mail. It is an impracticable proposiiion. The Senator can not mention a single publisher who would ask to have his magazine go on a freight train when it could go on a mail train for the same price.

Mr. SWANSON. If that is true——

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will suggest one we will communicate with him and find out.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, if that is true the amendment can not cost the Government one cent. It is only to meet those cases where the department has said the publishers were satisfied, and the dissatisfaction represented about 10 per cent of the publishers. What I desire to do is to have the language so framed that if the department and a majority of these publishers are satisfied to carry the magazines by freight and make a saving to the Government they may do it. If it will work satisfactorily to the publishers they should be permitted to do it. No one will be compelled to do it unless he desires it. To go by freight would save the Government a large amount of money, and it would seem to me if some of the publishers can get their transportation equally as quick they would certainly be patriotic enough to let some of the publications go by freight and save the Government the vast sum of money which would be saved in this case.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SWANSON. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Does not the Senator think it might be more effectual if it appealed to the interest of these publishers rather than to their patriotism, by making it less expensive if sent by freight than if sent by mail, leaving it to the publishers to elect whether they will send by mail at the higher rate or by freight at the lower rate? I think the expectation indulged in by my learned friend from Virginia is on rather an unsubstantial basis.

Mr. SWANSON. I will make this remark. I understand that most of the publishers are willing to send by freight, because we have had an investigation of second-class mail matter, and the report shows that there is an immense loss to the Government in carrying it. There has been an agitation going on for years to increase the price of carrying this mail matter, and it has been suggested to meet the losses, which have amounted to a large sum of money, the Government should compel it to go by freight. If the Government could make an arrangement with the publishers who are satisfied to let it go by freight, it seems to me the Government should not conduct an expensive service when a great many would be willing to let their magazines go in this way. Magazines are published two weeks before they are issued. A magazine goes to Chicago. It would seem that if publishers could save the Government a large sum of money they would be perfectly willing to have their magazines go to Chicago and other cities for distribution by freight, if they could get there in ample time, rather than that they should be compelled to send them by mail.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Virginia is entirely mistaken when he thinks that any publisher would consent to have his magazine go by freight when his competitors in the same city were sending theirs by mail. There are no publishers who would ask for such a service. To hold this open and require the department to preserve two systems of transportation—one by freight with the relays and the wagon service and the expense necessarily incidental to that freight service, when nobody would use it—it seems to me would be a very unwarranted position for Congress to take.

I trust the amendment to the amendment will not prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senate from Virginia to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SWANSON. I move to strike out the proviso that compels newspapers and magazines to have exactly the same speed of transportation. It would seem to me that that is a very dangerous requirement. It ends on page 22.

Mr. LODGE. The first proviso?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; beginning on page 21.

Mr. LODGE. From line 23, on page 21, to line 3, page 22.

Mr. SWANSON. It reads:

Provided, That all second-class mail shall have the benefit of the same facilities and shall receive the same treatment, without discrimination against any portion thereof, in respect to speed of transportation, the purpose being to reestablish the system in vogue prior to the establishment of the blue-tag system.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator from Virginia will allow me to make a suggestion——

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will inquire of the chairman of the committee if he sees any objection to striking out the words on page 22, lines 1 and 2, "in respect to speed of transportation." I see no objection to striking out those words. Will the chairman agree to striking them out?

Mr. BOURNE. I think there would be objection from an administrative standpoint. While the department itself was strongly opposed to the insertion and adoption of the committee amendments, they believed in order to make it operative and administrative it was advisable to have the very language in that the Senator from Virginia objects to, without discrimination in speed of transportation. The object sought to be obtained by the committee was to restore the conditions existing as far as applicable to second-class mail matter prior to the initiation of the effort on the part of the department to inaugurate economy, and to put things back exactly in the same condition as they were prior to the initiation of the blue-tag system. That is the purpose of the committee amendment. The provision preventing speed discrimination was put in at the suggestion of the department to make it more administrative, although I want it distinctly understood that the department's position was opposed to the amendment as a whole.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the trouble complained of was that in the shipment of magazines under the blue-tag system some magazines were being sent by freight and others through the mails. That is the evil which was sought to be remedied. That is remedied by the second provision completely, absolutely, and entirely. Then, to remedy that evil, they go further and deprive the department of any discrimination whatsoever in the speed of second-class matter.

What does second-class matter consist of? Daily papers and magazines and all other matter like that. Some magazines are published three or four times a year, while the daily paper must reach its readers the day of its publication.

I think the proviso is a mistake. I do not think the department ought to be prohibited from trying to give rapidity in transportation to the daily papers. It would seem to me that that amendment ought to be eliminated to the extent that it does that. It does not restore former conditions. It puts on new conditions. It does not restore the law as it was before this time. It proposes to say to the department, you can not exercise any discretion in giving quicker transportation and quicker delivery to the daily mail over monthly magazines. It seems to me that is not wise; that it is not a correct administration of the Post Office Department.

All that is desired to be accomplished, which is right, which is proper and just, is that one magazine should not be sent by freight and another through the mails, magazines of the same character and kind, and it is simply an imperious, capricious discrimination on the part of the Post Office Department. That is wrong. That power ought not to be given it. It is taken away by the second provision. Then to come in and say that we will change the law and that a power heretofore exercised to give quickness of delivery in transportation to daily papers shall be prohibited does not seem to me to be wise and proper.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, there is another difference between the daily paper and magazine that I think ought to be considered by the Senate. The evidence before us indicated that the average haul of the daily newspaper was about 50 miles while the average haul of the magazine was something like 600 miles. So considering the two elements of expense, the handling being one and the haul being one, the handling expense might be approximately the same for each but the haul expense was about 10 times as great on the average for the magazine as for daily newspaper.

So if we were discriminating in our rates between the magazine and the daily newspaper we would be justified in it by reason of the fact that the average cost of the haul of a magazine is more than 1 cent a pound in excess of the average cost of a newspaper.

It might be possible to work out a difference in charge based upon the distance of the haul, and we might provide that all second-class matter should go by fast freight at 1 cent where the parties so desired, and that any second-class mail going more than 100 miles, if it elected to go by fast mail train, should pay 2 cents. I do not very much expect any discrimination in the price, but I simply wanted to state the result of my study of the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia to the amendment will be stated.

Mr. SWANSON. I will move to strike out, on page 22, the words "in respect to speed of transportation."

The SECRETARY. On page 22, lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "in respect to speed of transportation."

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to say, further, that there are some trains run to carry first-class matter and daily papers to the place of destination, and to say that they, when crowded, must be filled up with magazines two weeks before they are issued and delay the carriage of the first-class mail and the daily papers would be an inconvenience. That is what the proviso would compel the department to do with that provision in it.

Mr. BOURNE. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia if he does not realize that if his amendment prevails he then forces the department by a law so that there can be absolutely no discrimination in any way, shape, or form as between different classes of second-class mail. The only limitation that is placed in this bill is on the speed of transportation. It was put in purposely so as to enable the department to administer under the enactment. It is a qualification instead of an injustice. It assists the department in its administrative operation. Instead of militating against it, it is for the benefit of the department, if the rest of the provision is adopted.

Mr. SWANSON. I would think the entire provision ought to go out and the law remain as it was before. There was no complaint in that respect. It is simply an addition to the law.

Mr. BOURNE. The purpose is to put conditions back exactly as they were before.

Mr. SWANSON. I move to strike out the first proviso. The second proviso lets the law remain as it was.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia modifies his amendment to the amendment. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 21, line 23, after the word "dollars," strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That all second-class mail shall have the benefit of the same facilities and shall receive the same treatment, without discrimination against any portion thereof, in respect to speed of transportation, the purpose being to reestablish the system in vogue prior to the establishment of the blue-tag system.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, in my opinion, if the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia prevails you simply restore the blue-tag system. The proviso that he asks to have stricken out is what eliminates the blue-tag system and requires that second-class mail matter paying the same price shall receive the same treatment, especially as far as the speed of transportation is concerned, which has been the chief objection on the part of the individuals who have felt that they have been discriminated against.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me? How is it possible that the old system can be reestablished if the second proviso is adopted? I do not see how it can possibly be done. The second proviso reads:

That the transportation of second-class matter in fast-freight trains and the manner of handling incident thereto shall be discontinued after August 31, 1912, and thereafter shall be carried in the regular mail trains, etc.

That prevents the reestablishment of the blue-tag system. It can not possibly be done.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to ask the Senator who has charge of the bill, if the provision which I ask to have stricken out prevents the blue-tag system, what is the necessity for the second provision? The second provision is the one that cures the ills that we tried to cure. That is the one which restores the law as it formerly existed. The first provision puts additional restrictions on the department and would compel them, as I said, to treat the daily papers precisely as they treat a monthly magazine. That will accomplish the purpose the Senator has in view, because they must all go with the same speed, the same methods of distribution, the same quick handling in the Post Office Department, the same quickness in getting them in the mail; but if the first provision goes out, it remains as it was before, and the second provision prevents the shipment by freight cars and destroys the blue-tag system entirely.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether he has considered this proposition? The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has called attention to the fact that the magazines in many cases receive an entirely different service from the service that the newspapers receive; that is, they send their magazines clear across the continent, whereas newspapers travel a comparatively short distance; they are delivered, as a rule, within a few hours from the time they leave the press. Now, I should like to ask the chairman whether he could not accept an amendment to this effect, so that the paragraph would read as follows:

Provided, That all second-class mail shall have the benefit of the same facilities and shall receive the same treatment, without discrimination against any portion thereof, in respect to speed of transportation for all distances less than 300 miles.

That would still enable the department to put upon freight trains those magazines published at wide periods of time, say a month, and send those magazines for which there is no great hurry by freight, but the newspapers, which the subscribers must receive immediately in order to be of any value, would have the protection of the 300-mile provision, and so would other publications, magazines as well. Magazines would have the same right within 300 miles, where they get the same service that the newspapers would. I suggest that as a compromise of this difference.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, if I understand the proposition of the Senator from Nebraska, to my mind it would centralize a power of discrimination in the hands of one individual that would be most dangerous. The right autocratically to designate which portion of second-class matter should go by freight and which should go by fast mail I think would be too great a power to give any individual. I think the only remedy is that suggested by the Senator from Georgia—if you have two services, have two different charges and allow the citizen to elect which service he will take. All citizens are entitled to the same service where they make the same payment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that is in a way an adaptation of the zone system which he himself proposes; that within 300 miles all shall have equal facilities as to speed, because within 300 miles speed is the essential object and it is necessary to get to the people immediately; but where a distance of 1,500 or 2,000 miles is covered the speed element cuts very little figure.

Mr. BOURNE. As between competitors the speed element is vital. If a large amount of advertising is carried, and one periodical can reach the coast a week or ten days sooner than another, the latter would be absolutely put out of business.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It would not under this amendment, for all would be treated alike.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The purpose was to have all over 300 miles go by freight.

Mr. BOURNE. All magazines and periodicals and newspapers as well? I did not so understand the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Anything going over 300 miles, say, as a fair limit——

Mr. BOURNE. That is, all second-class mail matter.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Might be subjected to slower transportation, but those customers—and you have got to think of the customers—who live within 300 miles of the point of distribution should not be subject to having that distribution delayed, but the delay when you have only some three or four hundred miles is an inconsequential matter. I suggest that within the zone system idea, for which the Senator from Oregon is now famous, we can stipulate that all facilities shall be equal within the 300 miles, and that after that point is exceeded and the service becomes greater another arrangement and perhaps a cheaper one can be devised.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BOURNE. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment, I think the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska is a good one for future consideration, but for immediate action I would not want, so far as I am concerned, to say that it presents itself strongly to my mind except for study. I can not tell how it would work out.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is also another adaptation of the very familiar provision of the present law that weekly newspapers are charged no postage for distribution within the county of publication, it being figured that the county is the natural field of activity of the paper and distribution there involves no transportation.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Nebraska if, under his amendment, the same discrimination would not be permissible after the matter went beyond the 300-mile limit; that is to say, would not it be within the power of the Post Office Department to do the identical thing they are now doing, except that now distance is not considered? One thing or the other ought to be done—either require all matter to go by freight or else go by mail, even beyond the 300-mile limit.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If Senators will allow me to make a suggestion just there: We can guard against that by providing that all second-class mail which goes a greater distance than 300 miles shall, if it goes by fast mail, pay 2 cents instead of 1, but that it can stay under the blue tag and the freight system if the 1-cent rate is desired.

Mr. BRYAN. Is the Senator from Georgia sure that that would take care of the daily papers?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think it would take care, at least, of the bulk of them.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Georgia how he would determine what goes beyond the 300-mile limit? Take a newspaper that has, we will say, 2,500 subscribers. There will probably be four or five hundred of those subscribers at all kinds of distances, and you would have to segregate the distance each paper goes, and that is something which may change every day. Some will stop and others will go on; so that it appears to me it is practically an impossibility.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will answer the Senator with ease. The newspaper would classify its subscribers under two heads—those living less than 300 miles away and those living over 300 miles away—and would pay 2 cents on those papers sent over 300 miles and 1 cent on those sent under that limit. It would be less trouble to do that than to classify by cities and by mail routes. There would be no trouble, I think, in making the classification.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, it seems to me that the amendment suggested would be a restoration in part of the blue-tag system, a system which was most unpopular among those who appeared before the committee. I can not recall a single instance of a publisher suggesting anything which would savor of the blue-tag system. It was universally and generally condemned. I think it is safe to say that I have received 150 telegrams and 100 letters from publishers of various magazines and kindred periodicals protesting against the very thought of a blue-tag system. The man who lives 301 miles from the publisher's office is just as anxious for his publication as the man who lives 200 miles away. To my mind the proposition would be disastrous to the publisher whose paper or periodical circulated beyond the 300-mile zone, and I do not think a more unpopular measure could be advanced. It was thrashed over quite thoroughly before the committee, and I can not recall, nor do I think the Senator from Georgia or the Senator from Virginia can recall, a single publisher who acquiesced in any suggestion along that line. I should vote against any proposition of that kind.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I did not insist that it was popular. Why should it be popular? There is absolutely nothing to recommend the retention of the blue-tag system or the increase of a rate except saving the Government perhaps three or four million dollars, and why should a proposition of that kind be popular? Of course it was not popular; but still we have got to watch matters of that sort, look after the Treasury a little, and provide for good business administration.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I quite agree with the Senator as to the matter of husbanding the public funds, but I believe there are other directions in which that might better be done without delaying the receipt of a publication by a man who lives 300 miles from the publisher.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Virginia.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs upon the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 22, line 12, after the word "law," to strike out "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid for carrying mail over the bridges across the Mississippi River at St. Louis, Mo., over and above the regular rates for the transportation of the mail by railroad routes" and insert:

Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid for the special transfer and terminal service between the union station at East St. Louis, Ill., and the union station at St. Louis, Mo., including the use, lighting, and heating of mail building and the transfer service at St. Louis, over and above the regular rates for the transportation of the mail by railroad routes: Provided further, That section 3 of the act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department, approved March 1, 1899, authorizing the Postmaster General to pay from appropriations for transportation by railroad routes for the special transfer and terminal service between the union station at East St. Louis, Ill., and the union station at St. Louis, Mo., including the use, lighting, and heating of mail building and the transfer service at St. Louis, at the rate not exceeding $50,000 per annum, be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided further, That on account of the floods in the Mississippi Valley commencing about April 1, 1912, the Postmaster General, for the purpose of adjusting compensation on such railroad routes in the second section as were affected by the floods and the consequent diversion of mails, is hereby authorized and directed to take the weights of mails ascertained on such routes during the successive working days from February 15 to April 3, 1912, both inclusive, and for the remainder of the weighing period from April 4 to May 29, 1912, both inclusive, to estimate the weights by applying to the weights taken during the period from February 15 to April 3, 1912, both inclusive, the ratio shown to exist between the weights taken on all routes during the first 49 days of the quadrennial weighing period of 1908 and the weights taken on such routes during the last 56 days of the said weighing period, the actually ascertained weights and the estimated weights to form the basis for the average daily weight upon which to adjust the compensation according to law on such railroad routes for the transportation of mails during the quadrennial term beginning July 1, 1912, notwithstanding the provision of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1905, requiring that the average daily weight shall be ascertained by the weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than 90, as the Postmaster General may direct.

Mr. CULLOM. I make the point of order that the amendment, beginning in line 23, on page 22, and running to line 8, on page 23, ending with the word "repealed," is general legislation.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, the Senate committee having stricken out the proviso in the House bill, as set forth on page 22, from line 12 to the middle of line 16, I think the point of order raised by the Senator from Illinois does not apply. The Senate amendment is germane to the provision in the House bill; and the purpose is to make operative and to perfect the provision of the House bill.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, the amendment contains a plain statement of fact. The provision absolutely repeals the existing statute.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I have no doubt the House provision would have been out of order if it had originally been offered in the Senate; but it came to the Senate as a part of a House bill, which we are now considering. The amendment is a Senate amendment to a House provision and is, I think, in order. The House provision was struck out, and this substitute is relative to the same subject matter, having the same purpose in view. To rule it out of order would be practically to rule the House provision itself out of order.

Mr. CULLOM. This provision stands by itself and repeals an existing statute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the fact that the first proviso, commencing in line 22, on page 16, and going down to the end of line 22, is a substitute for the House provision. The second proviso enlarges the House provision, even going to the extent of repealing existing law. The Chair does not wish to decide the question himself and will submit it to the Senate. Is the amendment in order? [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the amendment is declared to be in order. The question is upon the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 24, line 16, before the word "available," to strike out "immediately," and in the same line, after the word "available," to insert "for deficiency for the fiscal year 1912," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of freight or expressage on postal cards, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, and empty mail bags, $648,200, of which the sum of $123,200 shall be available for deficiency for the fiscal year 1912.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not wish to stop the Secretary from reading the bill, but before the amendment is passed upon I desire to say a word.

The amendment which has just been read is an item of deficiency, and is so estimated for. It was evidently sought to be covered originally in the bill by inserting the clause "shall be immediately available." The appropriation was clearly for use in the fiscal year of 1912, and had the bill passed when first introduced probably the fact would not have developed that it was a deficiency; but the Senator in charge of the bill has very correctly changed the language, because "immediately available" is no longer applicable, the 1st of July having passed. The question is, whether this bill ought to carry deficiencies which are estimated as deficiencies and which are included in the regular deficiency bill. I want to call the Senator's attention to that fact.

There are three items in the bill that are on all fours with this one. This is one of the three. We have had for years very stringent legislation to prevent, so far as possible, deficiencies, but they are necessary to some extent; we shall always have them; but in order to make it as plain as possible, and in order to conform to all our rules and practices, all department appropriation bills, no matter whether they are for the Army or the Navy or the Post Office or other branch of the public service, are sent to the Committee on Appropriations and are assembled in the appropriation bill providing for deficiencies.

The situation is this: The Senator from Oregon has included three matters here that are clearly deficiencies and which belong to a deficiency bill. One of these items is included in and has already passed the House in the deficiency bill. The others are before the Committee on Appropriations here, and should be added if we follow the estimates and the desires of the department as to deficiencies.

Now, while the House passed them before they became deficiencies as "immediately available," and it did not meet with opposition from the Committee on Appropriations there, I am wondering what position the conferees might be in if the question of jurisdiction should be raised over there on these matters which are straight deficiencies and so named.

Mr. BOURNE. They had jurisdiction when they passed the bill, and we cut it out because we thought they did not have the jurisdiction on account of the delay in consideration here.

As I understand, the Senator from Wyoming makes no criticism at all on the amount or on the item. It is simply the question whether they should go into the Post Office appropriation bill or the general deficiency bill.

Mr. WARREN. I am not questioning the items, because they are properly estimated for; but they are estimated for as deficiencies of that year, and I do not know how they came to be put in the regular annual supply bill in the first place. They should not have gone in there, because they were estimated for as deficiencies as far back as last February.

Mr. BOURNE. I can not answer the Senator. They went in in the House.

Mr. WARREN. I am not blaming the committee, and surely not the Senator in charge of the bill. I am calling his attention to what may be a vexatious question hereafter. We certainly have got one of these items in both bills.

On the other hand, I want to contend now that the Committee on Appropriations should not yield jurisdiction of deficiencies to any other committee. Personally, if other members of the committee do not object, I do not know that I shall in this case, inasmuch as it came in the way it did, but I fear there will be difficulty in passing it at another place unless we shall include it in the regular deficiency bill, which will now shortly come into the Senate.

Mr. BOURNE. I suggest that the matter go to conference, and the conferees can confer with the House Members. They were not deficiencies when they came over or when they were passed by the House.

Mr. WARREN. They were in reality deficiencies, but they did not so name them. When they sent them over here, it was early in the session, and they put them in with the words "immediately available," but they are deficiencies, as estimated for as far back as February. The reason they were not put in the urgent deficiency bill, I will say to the Senator, was that it was a little late, but they would have been put in had we another deficiency bill before the end of the fiscal year. Whether the House Committee on Appropriations will object to their being incorporated in this bill, I am not able to say.

Mr. BOURNE. I am fully in accord with the views of the Senator from Wyoming. But the House bill, as I remember, passed May 2. This was not a deficiency then, because the fiscal year had not ended. But now it has to be put in this bill as a deficiency, although it went in as "immediately available" in the House bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why is it a deficiency if we passed a joint resolution continuing in effect all the appropriation acts that we had last year? How could it be a deficiency when the departments are operating under the old appropriation acts passed for the fiscal year 1912?

Mr. BOURNE. I will acknowledge that that is a difficult question for me to answer.

Mr. WARREN. If I may be permitted there, we have had very urgent calls from the department to pad out that sum, stating that they have furloughed the clerks at different places and furloughed the operatives just because of that restriction.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand the Committee on Appropriations reported to the Senate a joint resolution to continue in effect for the month of July, 1912, all the appropriation acts of last year.

Now, how is it possible there could be a deficiency under that arrangement?

Mr. WARREN. It was before the 1st of July.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then, it properly belongs to the deficiency bill.

Mr. WARREN. I said it was before the 1st of July, and it is a deficiency, and does not pretend to be anything else.

Mr. BOURNE. In answer to the Senator's question, I want to say that the general continuing appropriation joint resolution is on the basis of one-twelfth of what the previous year's appropriations were.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand.

Mr. WARREN. That would be insufficient, because the Government is at its greatest expense at the end of the fiscal year. I mean the appropriations are made for the full year upon the estimates, and the decisions of Congress relative to such matters——

Mr. OVERMAN. For July it would not be sufficient?

Mr. WARREN. No.

Mr. President, I do not wish to embarrass the bill in any manner. I am willing that the amendments shall be agreed to with the understanding——

Mr. BOURNE. That it will be taken care of in conference?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; and without making a precedent for the future. We shall undoubtedly pass the other bill, and it will have to be stricken from one of the bills.

Mr. BOURNE. I will be glad to strike it out——

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator——

Mr. BOURNE. I concur absolutely in the policy——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The official reporter suggests that he is unable to hear this interesting dialogue.

Mr. BOURNE. I say I concur absolutely with the policy announced by the Senator from Wyoming, but I think this is rather sui generis in view of having come in in the House. I think it would be better to leave it in the bill, and I will say if it is provided for in the deficiency appropriation bill and this bill is still in conference I will be glad to strike out these items.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 20, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seven hundred and seven" and insert "nine hundred and fifteen," and in line 25, after the words "Provided further," to strike out "That after the 1st of July, 1917, the Postmaster General shall not approve or allow to be used or pay for any full railway post-office car not constructed of steel, steel underframe, or equally indestructible material, and not less than 20 per cent of the new equipment shall be put into operation annually after July, 1912; and after the passage of this act no contract shall be entered into for the construction of steel underframe cars" and insert "That after the 1st of July, 1917, the Postmaster General shall not approve or allow to be used or pay for any full railway post-office car not constructed of steel or steel underframe or equally indestructible material, and not less than 25 per cent of the railway post-office cars of a railroad company not conforming to the provisions of this act shall be replaced with cars constructed of steel annually after June, 1913; and all cars accepted for this service and contracted for by the railroad companies after the passage of this act shall be constructed of steel: Provided further, That the Postmaster General is authorized to pay for full railway post-office cars necessarily used in service by the Post Office Department from July 1, 1911, to March 1, 1912, when in his judgment reasonable and proper effort was being made by railroad companies to comply with the provisions of the act of March 4, 1912, but on account of insufficient time the requisite work could not be completed on July 1, 1911," so as to make the clause read:

For railway post-office car service, $4,915,000: Provided, That no part of this amount shall be paid for the use of any car which is not sound in material and construction, and which is not equipped with sanitary drinking-water containers and toilet facilities, nor unless such car is regularly and thoroughly cleaned: Provided further, That after the 1st of July, 1917, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, after line 4, to strike out "Railway Mail Service: For 14 division superintendents, at $3,000 each; 4 assistant superintendents, at $2,200 each; 14 assistant division superintendents, at $2,000 each; 139 chief clerks, at $1,800 each; 295 clerks, class 6, at not exceeding $1,600 each; 1,536 clerks, class 5, at not exceeding 1,500 each; 635 clerks, class 5, at not exceeding $1,400 each; 2,889 clerks, class 4, at not exceeding $1,300 each; 2,496 clerks, class 4, at not exceeding $1,200 each; 6,644 clerks, class 3, at not exceeding

$1,100 each; 2,727 clerks, class 2, at not exceeding $1,000 each; 600 clerks, class 1, at not exceeding $900 each; 600 clerks, class 1, at not exceeding $800 each; in all, $21,035,550" and to insert:

Railway Mail Service: For 15 division superintendents, at $3,000 each; 4 assistant superintendents, at $2,200 each; 15 assistant division superintendents, at $2,000 each; 112 chief clerks, at not exceeding $2,000 each; 32 clerks, grade 10, at not exceeding $1,800 each; 304 clerks, grade 9, at not exceeding $1,700 each; 1,501 clerks, grade 8, at not exceeding $1,600 each; 573 clerks, grade 7, at not exceeding $1,500 each; 2,767 clerks, grade 6, at not exceeding $1,400 each; 2,297 clerks, grade 5, at not exceeding $1,300 each; 6,369 clerks, grade 4, at not exceeding $1,200 each; 2,802 clerks, grade 3, at not exceeding $1,100 each; 905 clerks, grade 2, at not exceeding $1,000 each; 900 clerks, grade 1, at not exceeding $900 each; in all, $22,941,711; and the appointment and assignment of clerks hereunder shall be so made during the fiscal year as not to involve a greater aggregate expenditure than this sum; and to enable the Postmaster General to reclassify the salaries of railway postal clerks, he may exceed the number of clerks in such of the grades as may be necessary: Provided, That the number of clerks in the aggregate as herein authorized be not exceeded.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I want to bring up at this time and call to the attention of the chairman of the committee a condition which existed some time ago and which, in part, still exists in the Railway Mail Service. I refer to the demotion of a number of railway mail clerks, by order of the Postmaster General, without a trial or a hearing of any sort, and without the employees being permitted to know the evidence against them or even definitely the charges laid against them.

I secured from the Post Office Department, through a resolution of the Senate, information to the effect that there are, as I recall it, some 23 of these railway postal clerks still suffering under demotion, and I have in my own State 5 or 6 of that number. I know some of these men personally, and it seems to me that the situation is one which calls for some form of protection being extended to them.

Mr. BOURNE. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. BOURNE. The first paragraph of section 6 of the bill will, if enacted, prevent a repetition of the cases the Senator refers to, and we will reach that paragraph when we get along further in the bill.

It provides that an employee, before removal or demotion, shall know the causes upon which he is removed or demoted, and that he is entitled to a hearing and entitled to full information relative to the matter.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator in charge of the bill will permit me, I will refer the Senator from Nebraska to page 67 and part of page 68 of the last information print, copied from pages 48 and 49 of the regular print.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What is guaranteed to the employee?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If you will allow me to read the paragraph, I will do so:

6. That no person in the classified civil service of the United States employed in the postal service shall be removed therefrom except for such cause as will promote the efficiency of said service and for reasons given in writing, and the person whose removal is sought shall have notice of the same and of any charges preferred against him, and be furnished with a copy thereof, and also be allowed a reasonable time for personally answering the same in writing; and affidavits in support thereof; but no examination of witnesses nor any trial or hearing shall be required except in the discretion of the officer making the removal; and copies of charges, notice of hearing, answer, reasons for removal, and of the order of removal shall be made a part of the records of the proper department or office, as shall also the reasons for reduction in rank or compensation; and copies of the same shall be furnished to the person affected upon request.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think such a provision would probably have the effect of protecting men in the future, but I am speaking now of some six men in my State who were arbitrarily demoted without being informed as to what the charges were against them, without having any opportunity to present their defense, and although I have applied and appealed to several branches of the Post Office Department, from the Assistant Postmaster General to the inspector, I have absolutely failed to secure any relief for these men. One of them——

Mr. BOURNE. Does the Senator from Nebraska suggest that we put in a provision applying to them?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have drawn an amendment which I propose to ask to be inserted at this point, reading:

And no clerk covered by this paragraph shall be demoted, nor shall a previous demotion continue in force until the clerk shall have been supplied with a detailed statement of the charges against him, and by whom made, and be given a full opportunity to meet the same.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire at this point to reserve the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. BOURNE. In other words, the Senator's desire is, as I understand, to make the first paragraph of section 6 apply to instances of demotion that have already occurred?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. BOURNE. I suggest to the Senator that he let that go over until we come to section 6.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will do so if the Senator requests it.

Mr. President, I myself have felt outraged that these men, one of whom has been serving for 23 years, a man of good standing in the community, of excellent character, should be compelled to appeal as he did to the Post Office Department time and time again for a mere statement of what were the charges against him and who brought them, and be met with the refusal of the department to even state what he was charged with or the evidence against him or who brought the charges.

Here was a man who had secured a sixteen hundred dollar a year position as the result of civil-service examination and merit, and yet that was arbitrarily taken away from him. Without a hearing and without definite charges he was demoted to a twelve hundred dollar a year position without any opportunity for relief. I think there ought to be something done, not only to protect employees in the Post Office Department in the future, but if possible to restore those men who are still suffering under that discrimination and that outrageous use of departmental power to their former positions. If the Senator will accord me an opportunity, when the time comes, I shall be glad to present the matter.

Mr. BOURNE. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, if it were now in order I would propose as a substitute for all of this that all these men be turned out every four years. I think the right to hold an office is not a natural right, and that these gentlemen who occupy these offices in this easy way might now and then be sent back to the body of the people to learn how it is to earn a living in other ways than by serving the Government, and they ought to become taxpayers every once in a while instead of taxeaters all the time.

If this provision becomes a part of the law, then these men in the Post Office Service will be as secure in their offices for life as the Federal judges are, the only difference being that we will probably have to have an inquest up in the department instead of having one in the Senate.

I do not believe, Mr. President, there is any place in a Government like ours for life tenure. I am one of the men who do not believe in a life tenure for judges, although I believe in a tenure sufficiently long to remove them from the influences which are supposed to sway the minds of men.

But surely these gentlemen are not of such consequence in the administration of this Government that we must make a class of them, segregate them from the balance of the people, and leave them to work in the shade at a handsome salary for the balance of their lives, while their brothers who are out on the farm are working in the sun for half the compensation in order to earn taxes to pay these larger salaries. I have no sympathy with any proposition to secure men for a lifetime in any kind of an office.

If the Senator from Nebraska will just cast his eyes forward beyond the 4th of next March, he will find much need for some of these places for the worthy Democrats who have been kept out for so many years.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I resent somewhat what the Senator from Texas says. I can not think that he has applied his remarks with a full understanding of the situation. I am not referring to men who will be placed in position as a result of favor. I am referring to men in the Railway Mail Service who have secured their positions on merit, who hold their positions on merit, under the law of Congress. I am referring to men who have become experts in the Railway Mail Service.

I want to say to the Senator from Texas it is of more importance to the people of the United States whom they serve than it is to the men themselves that their positions should be held permanently and not at the will of political officials put in temporary charge over them.

The men in the Railway Mail Service lead lives so strenuous that anyone who has been in a railway mail car or who knows anything of the Railway Mail Service knows that the tension under which the railway mail clerks work is among the greatest strains that human beings are subjected to.

Mr. BAILEY. Then they ought not to be subjected to it for a whole lifetime.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is utterly impossible to think of serving the people of the United States in that wonderful service, with the high degree of skill required, by putting men in office one year and turning them out another.

Mr. BAILEY. No; I would give them four years.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is of more importance to the people of the United States that those men should feel that their positions are secure as long as they serve the people faithfully, and they should not be subjected to being ejected from their positions and thrown upon the world without being given an opportunity to know what the charges are which are made against them.

I want to say one word more to the Senator from Texas. This particular controversy arose in the West as the result of men being required to work 16 hours a day in the Railway Mail Service. During the latter part of 1910, what is known as the "slack order" was issued by the Postmaster General, and the chief clerk at Omaha verbally advised the clerks that it was the policy of the department to require eight hours' road duty of clerks, and that they would not be allowed time for delayed trains, or time performed at terminals, and extra runs that they might be called on to make, and they were then taking off crews and reducing the number of clerks on many lines to bring their road duty up to the eight-hour schedule. Clerks were at that time and had been for some time performing extra duty on their own and other lines in counting and verifying the various classes of mails. Also, owing to the reduction in the number of clerks employed throughout the country, stuck or unworked mail was accumulated in all the large cities throughout the country, and clerks off duty were called on during their lay-off period to work this mail. Also what is known as "terminal duty" was established and clerks assigned to road duty were given a regular assignment for their lay-off period of work.

The result of the excessive work required of these men is without any reason, except to grind down the expenditures of that department in order that the Postmaster General may make an apparent showing all over the country of economy.

The result of the hardships on these men was that they held meetings and protested to the department, and the result of those protests, Mr. President, was that the evil was remedied and the Postmaster General was forced to recall that order, and he himself then disclaimed responsibility for it, admitting that it was an outrage upon the clerks. Yet the men who were active in filing this protest have been punished and are still being punished by the department.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska did not quite understand me if he understood me to mean that his proposition was any more objectionable than the pending proposition. I think, if men are to have a life tenure they ought not to be removed without some notice to them. But I was unfortunate in expressing myself if I did not make it plain that my objection is to the life tenure, not to the suggestion that those who hold for life shall have notice of an intention either to demote them or to remove them.

When the Senator from Nebraska reads his statement in the RECORD he will be rather surprised at the extravagance of his speech when he declared that this service is so important and that in practice it takes a long time to qualify a man for this work. I could easily find enough capable men in 30 days to fill all these places. The man who can not learn to do this work in 90 days can never earn $1,500 at anything in his life. There is no special or technical knowledge required. There is a certain skill of hand in distributing this mail, and I have no doubt that long practice brings a certain proficiency in that; but what happened to the mail service of the country before these gentlemen had held these offices for so long a time? Does the Senator intend for us to understand that during all the time these men were acquiring this knowledge, which he says now makes them indispensable to the Government, the mail service of the country suffered? Oh, no; the mail service of this country has been excellent ever since I can remember, or at least ever since I have been going to the post office.

Mr. President, if there are any people in this Republic who could best serve it by holding their offices for life, I say it would be the Senators and the Representatives. I would not want that to go into effect until after the 4th of next March, but I do not hesitate to say that experience and knowledge are worth more in the Congress of the United States than in any other, indeed, than in all other departments of the Government except the judiciary. Yet I think there is no Senator here who would be willing to give Senators their seats in this Chamber during their good behavior. I think that we all think it better for us to resubmit the fidelity and the wisdom of our service to the people of the several States every six years; and Members of the other House are compelled to do that every two years. Yet they perform a service vastly more important to the welfare of the country than all the mail service put together.

While I would not be willing to go back to the time when the mail was a matter of personal or private distribution, I would rather do that if I could give the American people a wise American Congress through all the years than to give them the best mail service that skill, ingenuity, and experience can provide and still leave them with a Congress less wise than it ought to be.

Oh, no, Mr. President, there is no department of the Government where the efficient administration of it requires a life tenure. If there be any such department, it is certainly the judiciary; and most of the Senators—certainly most of the Senators on this side—would like to see that modified. I think most of us would like to see a term of office long enough to render the judge independent of popular passions, popular prejudices, and still not so long that he must remain on the bench after he has become incapable of properly performing the duties of his great office.

But it will make precious little difference in the destiny of this Republic whether a mail carrier holds for 4 years or 40 years, so far as the efficiency of that service is concerned. There is, however, another and a larger view of this question, and it is of vast consequence whether we are to build up an office-holding class in this country.

Mr. President, I want to go one step further. I want to say here what I have said on more than one other occasion, that when you perfect your civil service and through it establish a life tenure for all the employees of the Government, a civil pension follows as naturally as the night follows the day. When these people have served at excellent salaries for 40 or 50 years, they will come in and they will say, as they have been saying with tremendous effect in some quarters, that they have given their lives to the service of the Government and the Government ought to take care of them in their old age. I can not comprehend the justice or the logic which compels the taxpayer to save something out of his meager income or suffer the consequences of his folly or misfortune in his old age, and yet applies a different rule to those who receive a part of his taxes in the shape of salaries.

When I came to Congress, 22 years ago, we had only a retirement for the Army, Navy, and the judiciary, and nobody then, except a few of us, expected the policy to be extended; but it has been already extended, and recommendations have come to us from more than one President that it be made to include practically all department employees.

So it will go on, from bad to worse. These men are given excellent positions, with salaries above what similar work commands in individual and corporate employment, and yet they are to be taught to imitate the spendthrift, waste what they earn while they are working, in the confident assurance that the taxpayers of this country will be compelled to take care of them in their old age.

So far as I am concerned, I should like to see the office-holder, at least, go back to the people for a renewal of the commission at such intervals as will remind him, and keep him always reminded, that he is not of an office-holding class.

But the inevitable effect of a life tenure in this country is to create a separate class, and to see how large that class is becoming we need only to consult the Blue Book of the United States. There is in the archives of this Government a report, in which it is said that whenever the patronage of the Federal Government should reach one hundred thousand it would seriously menace the power of the people to change its administration. We have now, I believe, passed the three hundred thousand point, and our annual expenditures have risen from the modest sum of $58,000,000, immediately preceding the war, to the stupendous and almost inconceivable sum of a billion dollars now, and still we have not reached the end. We go on multiplying these offices; we go on increasing these salaries; we go on extending these privileges; and yet the taxpayers of the United States must foot the bill. I am opposed unalterably to it.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask the Senator from Oregon to accept an amendment to the amendment. It is to strike out, after the semicolon, line 3, page 28, beginning with the word "and," that and the two lines following and to the semicolon in line 6, so as to put it on the same basis exactly as the total sum on page 12, where the appropriation of $37,000,000 provides for employees not in the mail service.

Mr. BOURNE. I gladly accept the suggestion of the Senator from Wyoming.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 28, line 3, after the word "dollars" and the semicolon, strike out the words:

> And the appointment and assignment of clerks hereunder shall be so made during the fiscal year as not to involve a greater aggregate expenditure than this sum.

Mr. BOURNE. That is to make it conform with the previous provision.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BOURNE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, August 1, 1912, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 31, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, our Father in heaven, that by the example of every pure, noble, self-sacrificing life, especially by that of the Jesus of Nazareth, which looms brighter and brighter as the years come and go, we are brought, if we will, in contact with the pure, life-giving currents ever flowing from the heart of the Father soul.

I am come, said the Master, that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly.

Make us, we beseech Thee, susceptible to Thy holy influence that our lives may be pure, Godlike. In the spirit of the Lord Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a request for unanimous consent. I understand from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the leader of the minority, that a number of gentlemen on his side of the House desire to have an opportunity to-morrow to attend the notification ceremonies when President Taft will be notified of his nomination for the Presidency, and do not desire to be in the House between the hours of 12 and 3 o'clock p. m. Recognizing that that is an important event to that side of the House, I think that we should do them the courtesy of yielding to the request, and therefore I ask unanimous consent that when the House meet to-morrow at 12 o'clock there shall be general debate until 3 o'clock, the time to be controlled by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. General debate upon what?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. General debate on the state of the Union, the Speaker to control the time. It enables gentlemen on this side, who desire to deliver speeches, to have the opportunity, and at 3 o'clock, unless the conference report on the naval bill is taken up, I give notice that I shall move to take up for consideration the cotton bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House meet to-morrow at 12 o'clock it shall spend three hours in general debate, the time to be controlled by the Speaker, and he gives notice that at the end of that time, unless the naval conference report is taken up, he will call up the bill to revise the cotton schedule. Is there objection?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if it would not be possible to arrange that when we adjourn to-day we adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, for the purpose of taking up for consideration the seamen's bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, Members upon this side of the House are invited to the White House to attend the notification ceremonies and to luncheon to-morrow. The ceremonies begin, I believe, at 11 o'clock in the morning, and the luncheon is at 1.30, so that it would not be practicable to accede to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Would it be possible, then, to reach an understanding that we proceed with the consideration of the seamen's bill at 3 o'clock?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] gave notice a few days ago that he would call up the conference report on the naval appropriation bill on Thursday—to-morrow—and I take it that that is likely to be done, and, if not, the gentleman from Alabama gives notice that he will call up the cotton bill. I would say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I do not think there will be any difficulty in disposing of the seamen's bill and a number of other bills.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I do not think there will be, if we can get it up for consideration.

Mr. MANN. I mean before long, or before final adjournment. I do not see any opportunity of doing it this week.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that, so far as I am concerned, I shall be very glad to see him have the opportunity to pass the seamen's bill. I am for it, but that bill has been pending in the House two or three days and has had a fair opportunity. The supply bills of the House and this tariff bill must be passed before adjournment. They are matters of great public importance, and these other bills, in my judgment, ought to give way to them until they are out of the way.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, when these various bills go to conference I think there will be plenty of opportunity to pass the seamen's bill and a number of other bills that are made privileged.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Chair to put my request.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraw his suggestion?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I withdraw my suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House meets to-morrow at 12 o'clock there shall be general debate for three hours, the time to be controlled by the Speaker. In addition to that request he gives notice that at 3 o'clock, unless the conference report on the naval appropriation bill is up, he will call up for consideration the cotton bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

IMPEACHMENT OF ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

The SPEAKER. In the matter of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald the Chair refers to the managers on the part of the House the answer of Mr. Archbald.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by my associate managers on the part of the House to say that the managers were furnished on yesterday with a certified copy of the answer of Judge Archbald, additional circuit judge for the first judicial circuit, designated a judge in the Commerce Court.

The SPEAKER. The Chair merely formally refers the matter.

Mr. CLAYTON. I so understand, Mr. Speaker, and I am further directed to say that the managers have considered the answer in the matter of the impeachment proceedings against Judge Archbald and have directed me to present to the House, and ask its adoption, the replication to such answer, and I ask that the Clerk read the replication, which I send to the desk. (H. Rept. 1119.)

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the replication.

The Clerk read as follows:

Replication of the House of Representatives of the United States of America to the answer of Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States for the third judicial circuit, and designated a judge of the United States Commerce Court, to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives of the United States of America.

The House of Representatives of the United States of America, having considered the several answers of Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States for the third judicial circuit, and designated a judge of the United States Commerce Court, to the several articles of impeachment against him by them exhibited in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, and reserving to themselves all advantages of exception to the insufficiency, irrelevancy, and impertinancy of his answer to each and all of the several articles of impeachment so exhibited against the said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, do say:

1. That the said articles do severally set forth impeachable offenses, high crimes, and misdemeanors, as defined in the Constitution of the United States, and that the same are proper to be answered unto by the said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, and sufficient to be entertained and adjudicated by the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment.

2. That the said House of Representatives of the United States of America do deny each and every averment in said several answers, or either of them, which denies or traverses the acts, intents, crimes, or misdemeanors charged against the said Robert W. Archbald in said articles of impeachment, or either of them, and for replication to said answers do say that said Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States for the third judicial circuit, and designated a judge of the United States Commerce Court, is guilty of the misbehaviors, high crimes, and misdemeanors charged in said articles, and that the House of Representatives are ready to prove the same.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the replication.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama to adopt the replication.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration and adoption of the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 654.

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate by the Clerk of the House informing the Senate that the House of Representatives has adopted a replication to the answer of Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States for the third judicial circuit, and designated a judge of the United States Commerce Court, to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him, and that the same will be presented to the Senate by the managers on the part of the House; and also that the managers have authority to file with the Secretary of the Senate, on the part of the House of Representatives, any subsequent pleadings which they shall deem necessary.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

CONSENT TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that on Saturday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, I be allowed to address the House for one hour, or such time as I may desire, in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that on next Saturday, immediately after the reading of the Journal, he be allowed to speak for one hour in answer to the remarks of Mr. RODENBERG, of Illinois. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LIMITATION OF HOURS OF EMPLOYEES ON PUBLIC WORKS.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the unfinished business before the House is the bill H. R. 18787, and the House automatically resolves itself——

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, pending the House resolving itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union I would like to ask if we can have some arrangement about closing general debate on this bill. General debate on this bill continued all of last Wednesday, and I would like to see if we can not have an arrangement by which we can close general debate to-day.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, several gentlemen on this side desire to speak in general debate. I do not know about that side of the House. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD] the other day said he desired to be heard in general debate. I would be perfectly willing, I think, to close general debate not later than half past 3.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask that general debate on this bill close not later than half past 3.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill close not later than half past 3. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The House automatically resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18787, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill relating to the limitation of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon a public work of the United States and of the District of Columbia, and of all persons employed in constructing, maintaining, or improving a river or harbor of the United States and of the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] is recognized.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to tell the story of the Chicago contests. I was there, listened to the evidence, and voted on the cases as the facts warranted and my conscience dictated.

A man who loses his case is liable to abuse the court; hence I paid little attention to the cry of fraud and theft emanating from the camp of the defeated. But when United States Senators—when men like CUMMINS and KENYON from Iowa and WORKS from California, in quasi-official pronouncements, talk about "tainted delegates" and an "illegal nomination," I feel it is time to speak out. Of course, it is not political expediency which prompts men of their caliber to make such statements; they actually believe what they say. But I assert without fear of successful contradiction that if they do honestly believe it, they have not read the record. That record—the stenographic report of the proceedings of the Republican national committee and the committee on credentials, as well as an intelligent résumé of both—will soon be within reach of everybody; and after the gentlemen just named have read and studied it, I know what will happen—they will retract. At least, I believe them big enough to do so. The smaller fry, because it does not suit their political purpose, will probably not do it, and I do not expect them to. Although, gentlemen, I say frankly, if ever in our history political necessity imposed upon a public man the obligation of absolute mental honesty, even in the political game, it is at this particular juncture. The life of the Republican Party depends upon it.

It may happen in the life of a nation that it becomes impatient with the truth and with the men who utter it. Such a state of the public mind is invariably due to the poison of malicious aspersion and calumny, insidiously spread, or if the temper of the people will permit, openly disseminated by the demagogue and the disgruntled politician. But, Mr. Chairman, I have an abiding faith in the sense of fairness and justice of the American people, and in presenting my facts confidently rely on that fair play which is always born of their sober second thought.

In my judgment, it is the solemn duty of every good American citizen between now and November to carefully study the evidence in the Chicago contests in order that he may form his own conclusions, and I predict that the Republican cause will be strengthened in exact proportion with the numbers of those who are willing to perform that duty. In other words, to weigh the evidence with impartial care will inevitably and irresistibly lead to the conclusion that every single contest has been decided strictly in accordance with its merits. In one important instance it will be found, the national committee gave the benefit of the doubt to the Roosevelt side when a decision in favor of the Taft delegates could have been defended with equal success. As a result of his investigation it will soon dawn upon the student of the evidence that a crime, unprecedented in its brutality, has been committed against the Republican Party by those who have rashly denounced the action of the committee and vilified its members without knowing the facts, and whose criticism, strange to say, was the more bitter the less familiar they were with the evidence. Therefore, I say again, let each good Republican who believes his great party to be worth saving (I do not appeal to those who are merely looking for an excuse to desert it) read the record for himself. The discharge of this solemn duty will make him a good citizen and a better Republican.

THE MEETING OF THE NATIONAL COMMITTEE.

When on June 6 the national committee convened at Chicago the political atmosphere was pregnant with electricity, and no one realized the gravity of the situation more keenly than did the members of the committee, upon whom at that moment the eyes of the whole Nation were turned. Who are those men? Political accidents, ephemeral nondescripts, satellites of a new will-o'-the-wisp brought to the surface by minority primaries? Oh, no; each one of them was in 1908 the choice of his State delegation for membership in the highest party council; and many of them, as leaders of their State organizations had led their party through the storms of many political campaigns to victory. I found the great majority of them to be men of affairs, earnest and high-minded men of integrity, experience, and standing, but, above all, men actuated by the spirit of party loyalty. Yes; they were and are Republicans. The prevailing sentiment among them was, as they gathered from all the States of the Union, a sense of solemn responsibility coupled with genuine feelings of regret over the bitterness of the contest.

We can not read the hearts of men, but there is strong circumstantial evidence to prove the rectitude of the national committee. It was patent to every member that there was but one possible remedy to relieve the strain, and that was to do justice, to decide the contests fairly and impartially. Let us see whether the members of the committee were actuated by such a desire. Surely, if it had been their intention to steal the nomination, they would have insisted on secret sessions and star-chamber methods, and furthermore, in order to be sure of their prey, they would have convened just about two or three days before the convention and railroaded their plans through by sheer force of numbers, giving as an excuse that lack of time unfortunately made a more careful consideration of the contests impossible. Not only are there precedents for such procedure, but it was the course usually followed; it was the invariable party custom, because, after all, the national committee, by preparing the temporary roll, only determines the prima facie right to seats in the convention, while the final determination of the contests is left to the convention itself. Now, I ask you, what did the national committee do in this instance? If you are fair, you will admit that every single arrangement tended to the promotion of right and justice. In the first place, the committee convened 12 days before the convention and actually consumed 9 working days—from the morning of Thursday, June 6, to the night of Saturday, June 15—with the consideration of the contests, and, needless to say, the presentation of the evidence commanded the closest attention from beginning to end. So thorough, in fact, was the investigation that not a single point, once raised, was allowed to remain in doubt, and it was the consensus of opinion that never before in the history of national conventions were contests heard with more scrupulous care and more searching inquiry into details. So much for that.

Now, as to the custom of hearing and deciding contests in secret session, I am happy to say that the first thing the committee did was to depart from this time-honored custom and to open the doors to all the press associations of the country in order that the public might actually hear the evidence in conjunction with the committee. The minority proposed to also admit correspondents of individual newspapers, but this was deemed unnecessary as every daily paper in the United States is affiliated with either one or the other of the five press associations, so that the purposes of publicity were deemed to be amply subserved by the original plan. Besides, these associations vouchsafed impartial service, their newspaper customers being recruited from both camps, while individual correspondents would have written accounts colored to suit the attitude of their papers. Even to-day I sincerely rejoice in the wisdom of an arrangement which insured full publicity and at the same time that impartiality of the reports without which the tongues of calumny would have had a still wider sway. And I leave it confidently to the judgment of the American people whether arrangements which insured ample time for careful consideration as well as fullest publicity smacked of burglary or of an attempt to steal the nomination, or whether they are not corroborative evidence of the most positive kind that the majority, with the sun of heaven as their witness, were bent on doing the fair and square thing.

In discussing these preliminaries which throw so striking a light on the motives of the majority I have purposely avoided all reference to the main issue, and in the following explanation of the contests I shall continue to do so for the reason that the final defeat or success of the one or the other presidential candidate had nothing whatever to do with the merits of the cases we were called upon to decide. In the committee room, too, the main question was never the subject of even private conversation. There was, however, tremendous pressure from the outside, emanating mainly from the impetuous followers of the third-term candidate. One day we were told the committee had no right to sit in judgment on the contests and should make room for the newly elected members, the next day it was argued that the delegates from the South should not be permitted to vote in the convention as these States never contributed any electoral vote to a Republican candidate. These efforts to force a change of the rules while the game was in progress were the more ludicrous because these rules were handed down to us by conventions over which the third-term candidate himself has held undisputed control. Why had he not changed them then? And the southern delegates seem to have been regarded as very valuable acquisitions by that same candidate, judging from the way in which Mr. McHarg went after them and from the indisputable evidence touching attempts to buy them. When all these arguments proved unavailing with the committee, then came the attempt at intimidation by physical force. News reached the hall that the party's chieftains were to be mobbed, and really there must have been some foundation to that rumor, for the police department took extra precautions for the protection of the committee.

BOGUS CONTESTS.

While thus the tempest raged outside of the meeting room the committee calmly proceeded with its business, bent upon allaying the trouble in the party, if possible, by a fair determination of the contests. Permit me now to tell the story of these contests. Altogether there were 252 seats contested, 238 by the Roosevelt people and 14 by the Taft people. While the surprisingly large number of contests filed against Taft delegates seemed significant, the committee was ignorant of their real nature when it began its work, but after the first Alabama cases had been heard it dawned upon the members that they were bogus contests, started, as an afterthought, months after the regular party conventions had elected Taft delegates. They were the work of Ormsby McHarg, who had gone South for that purpose. And what is true of Alabama proved to be also true of Virginia, Florida, and Georgia. In all these States the Roosevelt contests were devised for the sole purpose of deceiving the public—i. e., of making a showing for Roosevelt and cutting down Taft's uncontested totals. I do not ask you to take my word for this, as there is twofold proof for the truth of the assertion. That the Roosevelt members of the committee joined hands with the Taft members to throw these contests out and that the votes of the committee on the motions to seat the Taft delegates were unanimous, is alone convincing evidence of the frivolous nature of these contests, but we have additional proof in the shape of a confession from a Roosevelt newspaper, the Washington Times, owned by Mr. Frank Munsey, one of the largest contributors to the Roosevelt campaign, which, on June 9, 1912 (after the national committee had discovered and exposed the swindle), let the cat out of the bag in the following language:

> On the day when Roosevelt formally announced that he was a candidate something over a hundred delegates had actually been selected. When Senator Dixon took charge of the campaign a tabulated showing of delegates selected to date would have looked hopelessly one-sided. For psychological effect, as a move in practical politics, it was necessary for the Roosevelt people to start contests on these early Taft selections in order that a tabulation of delegate strength could be put out that would show Roosevelt holding a good hand. In the game a table showing Taft 150, Roosevelt 19, contested none, would not be very much calculated to inspire confidence, whereas one showing Taft 23, Roosevelt 19, contested 127, looked very different. That is the whole story of the larger number of southern contests that were started early in the game. It was never expected that they would be taken very seriously. They served a useful purpose, and now the national committee is deciding them in favor of Taft in most cases without real division.

It is needless to describe the effect of the discovery of this fraud upon the national committee. No one had heard the candidate to be benefited protest against it, and the fact that he acquiesced in and condoned it warrants the conclusion that he would have been perfectly willing to profit by it if the majority of the committee had been his pliant tools. Talk about tainted delegates and adopting the motto, "Thou shalt not steal!" Mr. Chairman, it is a well-settled rule that the man who would appeal to a court of equity must come with clean hands. The court of equity in this case are the American people. What do they think of that candidate's hands? Are they not reeking with the filth of deception? And has he not, as a result of this bunko game, forever forfeited his right to raise a moral issue with anybody and on any pretext?

THE REAL CONTESTS.

By unanimous votes or viva voce votes the original number of 238 contests instituted against Taft delegates was finally reduced to the following 72:

	Delegates.
Ninth Alabama	2
Arizona, at large	6
Fifth Arkansas	2
Fourth California	2
Thirteenth Indiana	2
Seventh Kentucky	2
Eighth Kentucky	2
Eleventh Kentucky	2
Michigan, at large	6
Third Oklahoma	2
Second Tennessee	2
Ninth Tennessee	2
Texas, at large	8
First, second, fourth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, and fourteenth Texas	18
Washington, at large	8
First, second, and third Washington	6
Total	72

INDIANA AND MISSOURI AT LARGE.

It is worthy of note that the delegates at large from Indiana are not included in this list. The fact is that the Taft delegates were seated by a unanimous vote, yet you no doubt remember Mr. Roosevelt's shrieking cry of fraud at the time of the Indiana State convention. It is confidently asserted by men who should know that that outcry was in type before the polls were opened. The contest turned on the vote of Marion County with the city of Indianapolis which, according to the Star newspaper published in that city, was as follows: Taft delegates, 6,163; Roosevelt delegates, 1,480. Mr. Roosevelt's followers on the committee voted to sustain the Taft delegates, but has anybody heard Mr. Roosevelt take back his false accusations by which the popular mind was so grossly mislead?

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Would not the gentleman permit me to finish my remarks?

Mr. WARBURTON. It is in reference to a statement the gentleman just made in regard to Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I will.

Mr. WARBURTON. I understood the gentleman to say that in Indianapolis, Marion County, Mr. Taft received something like a little less than 7,000 votes, and Col. Roosevelt 1,000. I understand the gentleman that he thinks that was a sufficient vote at the primary and undoubtedly gave Mr. Taft the right to the votes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I did not catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. WARBURTON. I will repeat it. I understood the gentleman to say, in Marion County, Ind., in which Indianapolis is located, President Taft received something less than 7,000 and Col. Roosevelt something over 1,000. Now, I will ask him if he thinks that that would be a sufficient vote to control Indianapolis——

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes.

Mr. WARBURTON. Well, now I will come to what I want to ask. Indianapolis, in Marion County, is about the size of Seattle, in King County——

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I do not see——

Mr. WARBURTON. I will state to the gentleman——

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I do not see how you can compare those two contests, and when we come to Washington I will be glad to take up that contest with the gentleman, but let me ask the gentleman, since he has interrupted me, Is he a bull moose or for President Taft?

Mr. WARBURTON. I have just filed as a Republican in my State, and I exercise the right to vote for ex-President Roosevelt or President Taft when the time comes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. You can not do that as a Republican.

Mr. WARBURTON. Watch me do it.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. You can not honorably. You can not ride two horses at a time.

Mr. WARBURTON. I do not try to do so.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Which one?

Mr. CLAYTON. He just has not made up his mind yet.

Mr. WARBURTON. I did not say that.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. When I was interrupted I was speaking about Missouri, and said that the Missouri contest at large had been decided in favor of the Roosevelt delegates.

Missouri is also left out of this list because the contest at large was decided in favor of the Roosevelt delegates. It was a case, as I said before, in which, by the action of the committee, an actual doubt was dissolved in favor of the Roosevelt side. If the committee had ruled that the delegation be divided, such action could have been successfully defended on account of a well-authenticated understanding between the opposing convention leaders to divide the delegates and refrain from instructing them, which understanding had been violated. In the face of the committee's action in this case can you make any sane person believe that the aim and purpose of the committee was to steal delegates? This one case alone should suffice to set public opinion right on this question.

ALABAMA.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not permit myself to be dissuaded from my purpose to tell the truth about the contests above enumerated even by a realization of the difficulty of changing the people's minds. Right in connection with the first case on the list, the ninth Alabama, I can show that the truth has been mortally wounded by poisoned arrows from Oyster Bay, yet I confidently believe that the truth will live and that our great party can not be killed by prevarication. Because of its decision seating the two Taft delegates, Mr. Roosevelt issued a bitter diatribe which the country eagerly swallowed, of course, and in which he intimated that men had been sent to the penitentiary for lesser offenses, but fortunately for the truth he did not stop there. He proceeded to tell the facts in the case as he understood them, and this enables me to show how utterly misinformed he was. Evidently he had heard but one side, and with this faulty information he rushed into print. Says he:

The Republican committee of this district, composed of 30 members, met to call the convention. Eighteen members were favorable to my candidacy, 12 to Mr. Taft's. The Taft men conceded that this was the regular district committee and began by participating in the meeting, but as soon as it developed that the Roosevelt men were in the majority the 12 Taft men left the meeting and called a convention of their own, leaving 18 members, a clear majority of the regular committee, to call the regular convention in which the Roosevelt delegates were named. No serious evidence was presented by the national committee to contravene these facts.

Of course not. The national committee presents no evidence, but it was presented to the committee by the Republicans of the ninth Alabama district, and they did not only contravene the facts as stated by Mr. Roosevelt but told the rest of the story, namely, that the whole controversy had been passed upon by the people themselves, inasmuch as the four counties in the district recognized and responded to the Taft call for the district convention, holding delegate conventions in two and mass conventions in the other two counties. When the district convention met all four counties were represented by unchallenged delegations and two Taft delegates were duly elected without opposition. The call of the Roosevelt faction, on the other hand, was ignored by all but one county. So the people have spoken in this case, and the question as to whether the Taft or the Roosevelt call was the regular one was decided by the Republican voters themselves. Shall the people rule? And more than that, the State convention passed upon the case by recognizing the delegates from those four counties who had been elected under the Taft call, and the national committee, by a unanimous vote, seated the delegates at large elected by that State convention. From these facts—I want the House and the country to listen to this in view of Mr. Roosevelt's course in this case—it appears that even if we conceded every claim he makes in the above statement the decision was bound to be in favor of the Taft delegates, and in truth the attorneys for the Roosevelt side never claimed regularity for the election of their delegates, but merely questioned the regularity of the call owing to a split in the committee. And what about that? When the committee met a dispute arose as to the right of certain persons to serve as members of the committee, and this resulted in each faction holding a separate meeting in the same hall. It was well established by the evidence that the Taft committee had the larger number of members whose right to serve was not questioned, to wit, 13. The right of the other two, William Latham and Harvey Hardin, whose votes were necessary to make a quorum (15) was challenged. It was claimed that not William Latham but his brother James was a member of the committee. There was ample evidence, however, that William Latham had been regularly elected a member of the committee and that he had previously acted in that capacity. As to Hardin, there was no question about his membership, but a few days before the meeting he had sent his resignation, to take effect only in case he was not present. He did appear, however, in ample time for the meeting, yet the Roosevelt chairman refused to recognize him and had appointed other men to fill this as well as other vacancies. His right to do so was sharply challenged, and it developed that his authority to fill vacancies was interpolated in a certain resolution, as it was written in between the lines in different writing and different-colored pencil. This gave rise to a question of fact upon which a very large majority of the national committee held that the lead-pencil insertion was a forgery, hence that the chairman did not have the authority to fill vacancies, and therefore the action of the Roosevelt committee was not valid.

I well remember the following question, asked by a Roosevelt member of the national committee in addressing a Taft witness:

Are you willing to make an affidavit that these lines in the resolution conferring authority on the chairman to fill vacancies were interpolated?

Answer:

Yes, sir.

That ended the matter, of course. Now, compare these facts with what Mr. Roosevelt says:

The contest against the two regularly elected Roosevelt delegates had literally no foundation whatever, even of the most flimsy description. There was no more ground for unseating these delegates than there would be, for example, in unseating the Taft delegates from Rhode Island, or in any district in any State where there is no contest whatever.

Mr. Chairman, as you have seen, this contest would have been decided by any jury in the land in favor of the Taft delegates without them leaving their seats, yet Mr. Roosevelt made it the basis of a most virulent attack, with the plain intention of inciting the passions of his hysterical followers and bringing down upon the heads of the national committee the contempt as well as the indignation and wrath of the American people. The language of the Chicago anarchists which precipitated the Haymarket riots was incendiary, and the law reached out after them, poor wretches that they were. Is there no law to reach a prominent offender? I say it would be unpardonable to incite and poison the minds of the people at a time of great nervous tension, even if there were justification for it, but to do so as a result of misinformation and when you are clearly in the wrong is nothing less than criminal. And as Mr. Roosevelt has not yet seen fit to apologize to the national committee on account of the cruel injustice he has done them, I take this occasion to solemnly protest, on behalf of myself and my then colleagues, against the unwarranted reflection upon the integrity and the honor of the committee, as well as against the infamous attempts to create, by untruthful statements, a false public sentiment regarding the Chicago contests, to the great detriment of the Republican Party and its national candidates.

It is natural that after this Oyster Bay utterance in which, among other things, it is hypocritically asserted that the Republican Party is "an instrument for good government which it is wicked to destroy," the people should have become distrustful and suspicious with regard to the action of the national committee in all the contests yet to be decided, and the Ninth Alabama was only the start. But I am determined upon pitting the truth against that suspicion with a view to eradicating it at least from the minds of all those who are able and willing to read, and, therefore, I propose to discuss all the contests included in the so-called "purging resolution."

ARIZONA.

In the Arizona case the seats of the six Taft delegates at large were contested on the ground of a rump convention having been held by the Roosevelt adherents in a corner of the same hall in which the regular convention was taking place. The rump convention was attended by 25 delegates, while 64 delegates remained in the regular or Taft convention. Although there had been contests in Maricopa and other counties, only one such contest was presented to the State committee when it made up the temporary roll. This was from Cochise County, and it was decided to seat both delegations with one-half vote each, with the understanding that both delegations should present their case to the committee on credentials when appointed by the convention. In the State convention the Taft men were in control by a large majority, but the moment the temporary chairman had taken his seat a number of persons, including about 17 whose names were on the temporary roll, pushed to the right-hand side of the hall, one of their number mounted the platform, and after 15 or 20 minutes of noise and confusion they left the hall and did not return. The Arizona contest is the result of the proceedings so conducted during that space of time. The record of this so-called convention showed the appointment and report of committees and the election of delegates to the national convention, but it was conceded that these reports, including that of the committee on credentials, had been prepared in advance. In other words, the Roosevelt people knew they would be in a minority in the convention and had staged and prepared for the bolt in advance. The regular convention remained in session for several hours longer and transacted its business in a legal and proper way, not even forgetting a vote of thanks to the citizens of Tucson who had arranged for the entertainment of the first Republican convention in the new State. Is there any one who doubts the correctness of the decision of the national committee that this convention was the only regular and legal convention held in the State of Arizona?

ARKANSAS.

Mr. Roosevelt's list of "stolen delegates" also contains the two delegates from the fifth district of Arkansas. This contest was, as the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] properly characterized it, a joke and a farce. Four years ago the national committee decided which faction represented the regular organization in that district, and as no appeal was taken to the committee on credentials, that decision remained in force. The organization so recognized was practically the only one in existence; it put congressional candidates in the field in 1908 and 1910, maintained county committees, and on May 6, 1912, held its regular district convention at Little Rock to again nominate a candidate for Congress and elect two delegates to the national convention. All its proceedings were in due and regular form, and the one contest presented was settled by seating both delegations with a half vote each. In the meantime it seems the old defunct organization, called the Redding faction, had been resurrected to secure two Roosevelt delegates, and it held a "convention" on the same day and also at Little Rock but in another hall. Only three days' notice had been given of the convention, and there was no evidence as to how many delegates attended it and whether they were Republicans. The national committee reaffirmed its decision of four years ago and recognized the two Taft delegates elected by the regular organization.

CALIFORNIA.

If noise were a test of merit, the protest of the Californians against the two Taft delegates from San Francisco might be adjudged as valid. The Roosevelt delegation from California, including several Democrats and led by a former Democrat and up to the Chicago convention an alleged Republican, the fire-eating governor of that State, certainly made a desperate attempt to carry the day by physical effort rather than by convincing argument. The facts in the case are as plain as daylight. It was anticipated that President Taft would carry the San Francisco district for several reasons, but especially because of his support of that city as the location for the Panama Exposition. In order to head off this Taft victory and to steal the district, as one of the Taft men put it, a law was rushed through the legislature seeking to enforce the State unit rule. In the fourth district the two candidates on the Taft ticket expressed a preference for Taft, but did not agree, the law permitting such discretion, to vote for the candidate receiving the highest vote in the State. At the election they received a majority of 300 over the Roosevelt delegates in the district. The national call expressly forbade any law or the acceptance of any law which prevented the election of delegates by districts, hence the California statute was passed in direct violation of the party law which, in accordance with the principle of home rule, recognizes the district as the unit and has been in vogue ever since 1880.

Mr. AUSTIN. The California law was passed, was it not, after the national committee had issued its call and had laid down rules under which these delegates should be elected?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes; it was passed for the purpose of getting these California districts which they knew would be for Taft.

Mr. AUSTIN. Before the gentleman passes from that, is it not a fact that in a previous national convention this very issue was fought out and delegates representing every State in the Union decided that the delegates from a district could not be elected by the State convention?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. True; that was the convention of 1880.

It is a well-settled fact that a State has no power to prescribe the manner of representation in the national convention of a voluntary party organization. If the authority of law were to be recognized at all to control national party conventions, it would have to be the authority of national law. Under a strict construction of its call the national committee could have unseated all 24 Roosevelt delegates, but, instead of taking advantage of a technicality, it admitted them together with the two Taft delegates from the fourth district, and the seating of the latter was in strict accordance with the law and precedent established in 1880 and followed in unbroken line ever since.

Mr. WARBURTON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I wish the gentleman would not interrupt me now.

Mr. WARBURTON. He has been interrupted by other gentlemen, and I would like to have the same privilege.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I thought we would fight it out on Washington.

Mr. WARBURTON. You said it had always been the rule. I want to say the State of Washington has always elected its delegates at large, and they have always been seated.

Mr. AUSTIN. I want to ask the gentleman if there is any controversy or question over them?

Mr. WARBURTON. I do not think so.

Mr. MANN. Did they not once elect their Members of Congress at large?

Mr. WARBURTON. Up until about eight years ago.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. If that is the case, they surely have departed from this rule at this particular time, because at the meeting of the national committee of which I speak the Roosevelt people from Washington made a fight with respect to the delegates at large, eight in number, and they also made a fight with respect to the delegates from the first, second, and third districts of Washington.

Mr. WARBURTON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question there. In the third district of Washington, in accordance with the report and rule of the State committee, eastern Washington had four Roosevelt delegates to Taft's one, and yet you seated in some manner—I do not know how—the two delegates from that district.

INDIANA.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. In the thirteenth district of Indiana the two Roosevelt contestants based their claims upon a rump convention which was held by a few Roosevelt followers, not more than 30 in number, after the regular convention had been in session three and one-half hours and had transacted its business and adjourned. At this rump convention there was no roll call of the delegates, the persons present did not sit down, no secretary was elected, but a self-appointed chairman, by viva voce vote, declared the election of two delegates and two alternates to the national convention. The regular convention had been riotous, and the confusion and uproar was kept up by the Roosevelt men for more than three hours. They resorted to these tactics after a Taft man had been elected permanent chairman by a very close vote, 71¼ to 70¾. This vote had been taken while the proceedings were still orderly, and it was a test vote favoring the Taft side. A dispute about the selection of the member from Fulton County for the committee on credentials was the signal for the "rough house" to be started, but during the confusion the report of the committee on credentials was adopted and the Taft delegates were elected. For 15 minutes the chairman, with a loud voice and through a megaphone, had called upon the Roosevelt men to make nominations for delegates, but none were announced. When the ayes and noes were called on the election of the delegates there were no noes, the Roosevelt delegates failing or refusing to vote. Adjournment followed, and the rump convention already described was held. A quorum of the convention was 72, the rump convention was attended by not more than 30 delegates. At the hearing before the national committee a new kind of evidence was presented by counsel for the Roosevelt contestants, namely, affidavits purporting to show that a majority of the convention had not voted for the Taft delegates. But as the result of the vote had not been questioned at the convention, the national committee, while permitting the affidavits to be read, declined to recognize them as valid evidence on the ground that duly declared and certified convention results must stand if no question was raised in the convention itself. This contest was decided for Taft, and I believe properly, by a vote of 36 to 14.

KENTUCKY.

The next on the Roosevelt list of "stolen" delegates are those from the seventh, eighth, and eleventh districts of Kentucky. The contest of the delegates at large of that State had been abandoned by the Roosevelt people after it had been shown before the national committee that if all the contested seats in the State convention—449 in number—had been given to Roosevelt, his strength in the convention would have still been 297 votes short of a majority. The test vote of the convention was taken on the adoption of the report of the committee on credentials, the vote being 1,872 to 434 in favor of Taft. There was no protest or bolt of any description. The contest filed as an afterthought is on a par with the fake contests from the other Southern States.

As to the seventh and eighth districts I adopt as my views the statements prepared by counsel at the request of the national committee. They are as follows: "In the seventh Kentucky district the total vote of the convention was 145. There were contests from four counties, involving 95 votes. According to the rules of the party in Kentucky, where two sets of credentials are presented, those delegates whose credentials are approved by the county chairman are entitled to participate in the temporary organization. On the temporary roll the Taft chairman was elected by 98 votes and 47 votes were cast for the Roosevelt candidate. The committee on credentials was then appointed, consisting of one member named by each county delegation. The majority report of the committee was adopted unanimously by the convention, no delegation whose seats were contested being permitted to vote on its own case. As soon as the majority report of the credentials committee had been adopted the Roosevelt adherents bolted. There was not the slightest reason for sustaining the contest for the Roosevelt delegates.

The eighth Kentucky district was composed of 10 counties, having 163 votes, of which 82 were necessary to a choice. There was no contest in 5 of the counties, and, although the Roosevelt men claimed that there was one in Spencer County, no contest was presented against the seating of the regularly elected Taft delegates from that county. This gave the Taft delegates 84 votes, or 2 more than were necessary for a choice. In other words, assuming that the Roosevelt men were entitled to all the delegates from the counties in which they filed contests in the district convention, there remained a clear majority of uncontested delegates who voted for the Taft delegates to Chicago.

The contest in the eleventh district of Kentucky resulted in a compromise, the national committee placing one Taft and one Roosevelt man on the temporary roll of the convention. The decision was reached because there was an honest doubt in the minds of the members. The whole trouble in the district convention arose over the arbitrary action of the chairman of the congressional committee, a Roosevelt man, who called the convention to order and, in violation of all party law and custom, appointed a committee on credentials himself, instead of permitting the delegations from the several counties to name the members. This caused the Taft men to hold a separate convention, with 284 lawfully elected delegates out of a total membership of 384. The national committee would have been justified in seating both Taft men, and yet it is said they were "stealing" delegates.

MICHIGAN.

In the "purging resolution" presented to the national convention the Roosevelt contingent also claimed the six delegates at large from Michigan for their chieftain. That contest, after it had been decided by the national committee in favor of the Taft delegates by a viva voce vote, was not even presented to the committee on credentials or the convention. It was too plain a case. The first roll call in the State convention resulted in 67 votes for the Roosevelt side and 818 for Taft. There were contests from Wayne and Calhoun Counties, but when the State committee made up the temporary roll the Roosevelt people failed to present their cases. They also failed to appear before the committee on credentials, although ample opportunity was given them to present their claims. The evidence left no doubt that the Taft men had carried Detroit (Wayne County) by a large majority, but even subtracting from the total vote of the convention the vote of the two contested counties, the Taft delegates still outnumbered the Roosevelt men by several hundred. As was their tactics everywhere in the country, the Roosevelt delegates made all the noise possible, but finally they grew tired and bolted the convention with not to exceed 200 out of a total of 1,312. At all times until the adjournment of the convention nearly 1,000 delegates were present and participated in the proceedings of the election of the six delegates at large. What, I ask, is your opinion of the mental condition or the moral make-up of a man who, in the face of these facts, brazenly sticks to his assertion that these six delegates were stolen by the national committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, can not I have a little more time?

Mr. MANN. How much more time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I think I can finish in about 15 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri have 30 minutes more.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Thank you.

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman states that he can conclude in 15 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. ROBINSON. Reserving the right to object, I would suggest to the gentleman that he take the 15 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not object to my request.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Let me conclude.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] have 30 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I will ask the gentleman if it did not also clearly appear that if the Roosevelt delegates had been seated from the counties of Calhoun and Wayne that there still would have been a majority in the convention for Taft?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes; and I am also going to show that in my statement.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Is not the gentleman mistaken as to the total number of delegates to the Michigan convention—1,800?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. That was the number of delegates who were entitled to seats in the convention.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I think you are mistaken as to the total number. It was 1,218. You are 500 to high.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I think the gentleman is mistaken, and I think it ought to be corrected.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I am glad the gentleman calls my attention to it. It is evidently a misprint. I shall make the correction. But that does not change in any way the argument.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. It does not change the result of your reasoning in this respect.

OKLAHOMA.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. In the third Oklahoma district the chairman of the district committee was a Roosevelt man by the name of W. S. Cochran. He knew the committee stood 12 for Taft and 7 for Roosevelt, and so when the 19 members met to make up the temporary roll of the convention Cochran attempted to prevent the majority from taking action.

Mr. AUSTIN. That was the name of the chairman?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. That was the name of the chairman.

Although the convention was to meet at 11 o'clock, he arbitrarily announced the committee adjourned until 1.30 p. m. and walked out with six of his henchmen. A motion to depose the chairman was then made and received 11 votes, a majority, and this majority then elected a new chairman and proceeded to transact the business before the committee. The convention was duly called to order on the temporary roll prepared by the congressional committee, which roll was made permanent, whereupon the two Taft delegates to Chicago were duly elected. Every county in the district was represented and voted in the regular convention. Cochran held a bolting convention in another hall, whose membership was largely made up of bystanders and idlers without credentials from any county in the district. I almost feel like apologizing to the House for taking up so much time with the discussion of contests as flimsy and frivolous as this one, but it forms part of the ground upon which the Roosevelt claims are based. I ask you, was there any alternative for the national committee but to sustain the action of the regular convention?

TENNESSEE.

In the second Tennessee district, so ably represented by my friend Mr. AUSTIN, there were 59 delegates uncontested out of a possible total of 108 in the convention. There were 49 contested. The Roosevelt contestants in the 49 refused to abide the decision of the committee on credentials and withdrew, leaving 59 uncontested delegates. These 59, a number of whom were Roosevelt men, remained in the convention, appointed the proper committees, settled contests, and proceeded to select Taft delegates. A few bolters held a meeting which they styled a convention and elected Roosevelt delegates, but being doubtful themselves about the legality of their procedure they unearthed the skeleton of a defunct committee which years before had been declared irregular, and by this means held another convention in which only a few counties were represented and which selected as delegates two men who had taken part in the regular convention formerly held.

Mr. AUSTIN. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state that a majority of the uncontested Roosevelt delegates participated in the convention that elected the two Taft delegates. They refused to go into the other, or Roosevelt, convention.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I am glad the gentleman made that statement.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman permit me there, in order that we may get all the facts in reference to that contest? The old committee, twice repudiated at the polls by the people and by the Republican national congressional committee, was revived. It is composed of a membership of 10, and of the 10 members 4, I understand, met and issued a call for the second convention, and of the 10 counties composing the second congressional district there were only 4 that held county conventions to send delegates to the second convention, and of the 4 counties, the largest being Knox County, the Taft men captured that convention and by a vote of about 250 to 25 refused to send delegates to the second convention.

Before I close I want to say this, that when this contest was presented to the committee on credentials——

Mr. HOWARD. I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] to speak a little louder. The tale of this rascality at Chicago is very interesting and we would like to hear it on this side.

Mr. AUSTIN. When this second-district contest was presented to the committee on credentials at Chicago, having 18 Roosevelt men on it, I insisted upon a roll call, and of the 18 Roosevelt men on the committee on credentials only 6 voted to seat the two Roosevelt delegates from the second district of Tennessee.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes. Then, in the gentleman's judgment, the action of the national committee in seating these two Taft delegates was legal and correct?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes. Not only that, but some of the leading Roosevelt members on that committee—Gen. Capers, of South Carolina; Mr. Heney, of California; Senator KENYON, of Iowa; and Mr. Kellogg, of Minnesota, who held proxies, as I am reliably informed, stated that they voted to seat the two Taft delegates from that district.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. That is true. That statement I can confirm from personal knowledge.

Mr. AUSTIN. And this was one of the cases in which the minority submitted a report to the convention, in which they claimed that these two delegates were stolen from the Roosevelt people.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes. There was not the shadow of a doubt about the validity and regularity of the first convention, and the national committee so decided by a viva voce vote.

In the ninth Tennessee district there are two organizations, one of which elected Taft, the other Roosevelt delegates. The Taft committee, however, had been recognized by the State committee as the regular organization and it was the one whose candidate for Congress had received a much larger vote than the candidate of the other faction. The national committee decided in favor of the regular convention and its delegates.

TEXAS.

By far the most interesting contests were those from the State of Texas, where for the last 10 years a political boss had maintained an oligarchy of officeholders. Nearly every one of these officeholders owes his appointment to the influence of the boss, the national committeeman and the chairman of the State committee, all combined in the one person of Col. Cecil Lyon. Under Mr. Lyon's leadership the Republican vote in the State has dwindled from 167,000 in 1896 to 26,000 in 1910, and this demoralization of the party seems to have suited the boss, as it exempted the party from a State primary law, applicable to parties casting over 100,000 votes, and thus tended to tighten the grip of a political despotism.

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. No; I prefer to go on now.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I can not yield for lack of time. I must go on.

Mr. WARBURTON. But you have yielded to other gentlemen, and I simply ask you to yield to me now.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I can not yield now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. This condition of affairs prompted the national committee to look more closely into political conditions and, particularly, the methods pursued in the election of the delegates to the national convention, and it must be a matter of intense gratification to every good Republican that at last this important work was undertaken. The results of the investigation were astounding. It was found that in 99 out of the 249 counties there was no Republican organization, yet each single one was voted in the State convention upon proxies which the postmasters had sent to Mr. Lyon. Naturally it was an easy matter for the boss to control every State convention by means of those bogus proxies when the total vote of the convention was only 248. Lyon and his machine were for Roosevelt and called themselves "regular"; but if the word is applicable at all, it is clearly an illegal regularity.

The national committee decided—and both the committee on credentials and the convention sustained the decision—that these 99 counties in which the Republican vote was but 2,000 and in which there was no Republican Party, no convention, no primary, no organization, was not the proper source for a proxy to give a vote equal to that to be cast by the other 146 counties in which primaries and conventions were held by regular Republican organizations. These proxies were therefore held to be illegal and not the basis for proper representation. It was decided to deduct the 99 votes from the total of 245 and give the representation to those who controlled the majority of the remainder. The remainder was 152 votes, and out of that the Taft men had carried 89 counties having 90 votes. This gave to the Taft men a clear majority in the State convention, and with it 8 delegates at large to the national convention.

The contests from nine Texas districts in which either the Taft or the Roosevelt men were contestants were heard separately by the committee, and close attention was given by all the members in order that exact justice might be done.

The Taft delegates from the first district were seated by a unanimous vote; hence it is unnecessary to go into details. The Roosevelt members on the committee, in other words, conceded the election of the Taft men, but Mr. Roosevelt insists that the delegates were "stolen."

In the second district, too, the Taft delegates were seated without a division being asked for by the Roosevelt members of the national committee. The convention which elected the Taft delegates was held to have been the regular one.

The contest in the fourth district was also decided in favor of the Taft delegates without a division. The convention which elected them was composed of practically all the regularly elected delegates.

In the fifth district the Roosevelt chairman refused to entertain a minority report touching the basis of representation in the convention. He abandoned the platform and left the hall, seeing that the majority was against him. Thereupon the convention went through its regular business and two Taft delegates were elected, by a vote of 8 to 3, according to county representation. The Roosevelt men later held a meeting, but the national committee recognized the regular convention and not the bolt of a minority.

In the seventh district there are four counties without proper party organization. Col. Lyon had assumed to appoint county chairmen in two of them, but the executive committee, meeting at Galveston prior to the convention, refused to recognize the delegates from any of those unorganized counties. Thereupon one delegate from Fulton County and the alleged representatives of the unorganized counties held a bolting convention, which the national committee refused to recognize.

In the eighth district convention a split occurred over the majority and minority reports of the executive committee as to the temporary roll. The Roosevelt followers controlled the executive committee, but did not have a majority in the convention, which adopted the minority report and gave Taft 5½ votes and Roosevelt 2½ votes. This resulted in the election of the Taft delegates, who were seated by the national committee.

In the ninth district the chairman of the committee refused to call a meeting because he claimed his superior, Col. Lyon, had directed that all district delegates should be elected by the State convention. Thereupon a Mr. Speaker, a member of the committee, called a meeting, attended by seven members, which issued a call for a district convention to be held May 15. Eleven counties out of fifteen responded to the call and took part in the convention, three being unrepresented. Taft delegates were elected. Then the chairman, having changed his mind, also called a meeting of the committee, and at that meeting a congressional convention was called, to meet on May 18. But the call was not properly published, and therefore the committee decided that the regularity was on the side of the Taft convention.

In the tenth district the undisputed evidence indicated that a flagrant attempt had been made to deprive Taft of this district, to which he was justly entitled. Two members of the district committee had acted in bad faith in the seating of delegates, and one of them misused the proxy intrusted to him. The Taft delegates therefore organized another convention, with delegates from six counties, which transacted its business in a legal and proper way. The Taft delegates were seated, and the case was not appealed to the committee on credentials.

When the committee of the fourteenth district met at San Antonio there were 10 members present whose right to act was undisputed. Six of them were for Taft and 4 for Roosevelt.

There were 4 other Roosevelt men present who were clearly not entitled to act, 1 of them holding the proxy of a dead man and the other 3 being postmasters who, under the law of Texas, could not serve as members of any political committee. There was a contest from Bexar County, which contains the city of San Antonio, but the testimony was overwhelming that Taft had carried that county by nearly 5 to 1. On the proper basis the total vote in the district convention was 67, of which the number instructed or voting for Taft was 37½, the number voting or instructed for Roosevelt 28½, not voting 1. Therefore, the Taft delegation was seated by the national committee.

WASHINGTON.

The claim to the delegates at large of the State of Washington was looked upon by the Roosevelt people as their star contest, and I remember well how they cast triumphant glances over to the Taft members while counsel was presenting their side of the controversy. But I also remember how completely crushed was their spirit and what pitiful pictures of collapsed human specimens they presented after the counsel for the Taft side, a brilliant attorney, by the way, had finished his argument. He had left nothing of the Roosevelt case but a memory, and when the committee gave the 14 delegates (the 8 at large and 6 from districts having been consolidated) by a viva voce vote to Taft the Roosevelt adherents, instead of raising the anticipated howl about robbery and theft, meekly took their hats, as adjournment immediately followed, and noiselessly left the hall, together with the Taft members.

Having taken a seat in the front row I was careful that not a particle of the evidence from either side escaped my attention. The majority in the State convention depended upon the recognition of either the Taft and Roosevelt delegates from Seattle or King County.

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. No. There can not be any contention about this. I am stating only the facts.

Mr. WARBURTON. I wanted to suggest one or two things in connection with it.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. When I get through I will give the gentleman the floor; when I get through with the State of Washington, I mean.

The contention of the Roosevelt people was that the county committee had ordered a primary at which their delegates had been elected by about 6,900 votes, that the primary had been properly called and that its result made theirs the legal delegation. The facts, however, as developed by undisputed evidence, were as follows: Under the State law of Washington county committees have the power to either select delegates directly or to call primaries for the purpose. In King County (Seattle) the committee consisted of 250 men from 250 precincts, the majority of whom were for Taft, and that majority, acting through its executive committee, selected the Taft delegates to the State convention.

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I am stating absolute facts and I do not want to be interrupted. I am stating facts that can not be disputed by anybody.

Mr. WARBURTON. I am undertaking to dispute the facts stated by the gentleman, which I know to be untrue.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri refuses to yield.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Meantime the city council of Seattle, by redistricting the city, had increased the number of precincts from 250 to 381, but at a general meeting of the county committee it was resolved that representatives to fill the 131 new precincts should not be selected until an election was held in September, 1912. In spite of this conclusion, the Roosevelt chairman of the committee who had himself presided at that meeting and not dissented, assumed the right to appoint 131 new committeemen, and with those voting it was claimed a primary was ordered. And remember that this was long after the committee had already selected the delegates to the State convention. Even the fact of the primary having been ordered is strongly questioned, because of the confusion prevailing at the meeting, but this is unimportant in view of the illegal action of the chairman.

The Taft men protested against this high-handed proceeding of constituting an illegal majority and refused to take part in the primary at which, as a consequence, only 3,000 votes out of a total Republican vote of 70,000 were cast, according to the newspapers. The national committee held, and properly so, that it was beyond the power of the chairman to add 131 precinct men to the old committee; as his authority to fill vacancies applied only to such places which became vacant after they had been filled. The fact is that nearly all precincts had been changed; consequently if the 131 new precincts were to be filled the entire number of 381 precincts must be filled. When the King County contest reached the State convention, the State committee, in preparing the temporary roll, decided that the Seattle primary election was irregular and illegal and seated the Taft delegates, whereupon the Roosevelt men bolted and held a separate convention. This is the much-advertised Washington contest in a nutshell. It is the duty of the national committee to sustain party regularity and legality in the selection of delegates. What else, I ask you, was there for them to do than to seat the Taft delegates from Washington?

Mr. AUSTIN. Before the gentleman leaves the consideration of the Washington contest will he yield to me for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Just in order to clear up a matter. When the gentleman was discussing the California case and the irregular action of the Roosevelt people in selecting all the delegates from the State at large, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WARBURTON] said that the custom in the State of Washington was to elect all the delegates from the State at large and not from the districts. I wish to state that I have examined the Congressional Directory for 1904, just prior to the Republican national convention of eight years ago, and the Congressional Directory just prior to the national convention of 1908, and it appears from this record that every Congressman from the State of Washington was elected from the State at large and not from districts, and hence under the call it was right and proper and in line with the action and the practice of the national committee to elect all delegates from the State of Washington in 1904 and 1908 from State conventions and not from district conventions.

Mr. WARBURTON. I am not quite certain, but I think about eight years ago that was the case.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I decline to yield further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri declines to yield.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I want to say, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WARBURTON], propounded a little while ago, and in answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN], that so far as the merits of this contest are concerned, it is absolutely immaterial how those delegates are elected. The manner of their selection, by districts or by the State convention, has nothing to do with the merits of this case.

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; but the point that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WARBURTON] was endeavoring to make was that in the discussion of the California case the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] was stating that the people of California had no right, in violation of the call of the national committee, to elect all the delegates in the State at large. Then the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WARBURTON] called attention to the fact that in his State it had been customary to elect them all from the State at large, and not from districts; and in answer to his statement I call attention to the fact that there were no districts in the State of Washington, but under that call it was their duty, and the only way, to elect delegates from Washington from the State at large and not by districts.

Mr. WARBURTON. Certainly, the gentleman will yield to me now, just at that point?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman does not yield.

Mr. WARBURTON. As a matter of fact, the gentleman does not want to yield to me at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri declines to yield.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] says he declines to yield, and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WARBURTON] makes an assault upon him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] has the floor. If a gentleman on the floor is interrupted and the gentleman making the interruption does not address the Chair, and the gentleman on the floor permits the interruption, the Chair is powerless.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, this completes my review of the contests. It shows conclusively that every one of the 72 delegates whose right to seats in the convention is questioned by Mr. Roosevelt was honestly seated and justly entitled to take part in the work of the national convention as a legal representative of the Republicans of his State or district. The decision of the national committee was in each single instance sustained by a two-thirds majority of the committee on credentials appointed by the convention, and finally by the convention itself. Since the convention has spoken and assumed responsibility, the scurrilous charges hurled against the national committee really signify a wholesale indictment against the Republican Party itself; hence the Republican who, with the record before him and in spite of it, continues to talk of "tainted delegates" and an "illegal nomination" is no longer attacking individuals, but is befouling his own nest. And more than that. A careful scrutiny of that record will convince him that if he wishes to leave the Republican Party he must leave it for other reasons than the malicious slanders about "stolen delegates," for, readily assuming the burden of proof, that party has successfully and forever purged itself of that infamous charge. It has bravely faced a great crisis, perhaps the greatest in its wonderful history, and forcing into the open and vanquishing its detractors and secret enemies, it was able, with providential aid, to emerge from the depth of distress with immaculate hands, a clear conscience, and a beneficent new-born program vouchsafing to the American people, as a logical sequence of its glorious record, progress and peace, protection and prosperity. Is there a true Republican in the land who will not heartily rejoice at this great moral victory?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall not refer to the slurs of men who have grown tired of their party affiliation, and who, if "convinced against their will, would be of the same opinion still," nor shall I take notice of the unjust denunciations audaciously reiterated on this floor a few days ago to appease a troubled conscience, but I do deem it proper and timely to throw some light on the political situation by examining the fingers which are trying to throttle the Republican Party. When we are unjustly assailed we have a right not only to defend ourselves, but to inquire into the motives of the assailants. Let me open up the inquiry with this question: Do you believe the national committee would have devoted 10 days to their most painstaking and exhausting work if they could have realized that there was to be but one real Republican candidate before the convention? Many delegates had their misgivings at the time. They remembered that in the widely advertised Columbus speech the name Republican was not even mentioned, but they still felt confident that no man would have the audacity to ask for a presidential nomination at the hands of a Republican national convention when at heart he was no longer a Republican. In the light of later events we know, of course, that this was a case of misplaced confidence, in other words, that Mr. Roosevelt never intended to abide by the decision of the convention except he himself would be the nominee. We know now that it was an ordinary holdup, not even without the customary threat "Your purse or your life!" "Give me the nomination or I'll kill you." Yes, and we can go further and say, when the third-term candidate made up his mind to violate all American traditions of political decency and go to Chicago, at that very moment he knew he was beaten, but expected to save the day by personal appeals to the delegates through persuasion, promises, coercion, or threats.

But he came with treachery in his heart and fully determined to bolt if things went against him, hence we are forced to the conclusion that, whatever its decisions on the contests, the national committee would have been condemned in any event except these decisions had resulted in his nomination. The cry of fraud was premeditated, and the shameless ejaculation "Thieves!" with which he shocked his audience on his entrance into Chicago was the battle cry of the new party. There could be no other, for principles and policies were forgotten, and if himself nominated, believe me, he would have made the race on any old platform, with his frantic followers shouting "Hosanna!" There was no more effective means to undermine the old party than to defame its character. In order to put a new party on its feet it became necessary to run down the old one. Certainly no sane citizen will desert his party and all its happy associations as long as he has confidence in it, hence that confidence had to be destroyed. What was there more convenient than to seize upon the contests as the handiest "big stick" for the work of destruction? If the national committee had heeded the injunction "Thou shalt not steal except for me!" all would have been well, but its determination to do its work conscientiously brought all the prearranged plans of party treachery to full fruition. A new party was born, but is it not bound to be stillborn? Can a party live or ought it to live when its birthright is a lie?

The national committee is not entitled to any credit for the faithful performance of its duty, but I predict that the time will come when the people will thank God its members could not be swayed by popular clamor and had the courage to settle all controversies strictly in accordance with the facts and the evidence.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it is for you and not for me to say whether in my 20 years of service in this House I have established a reputation for veracity, but from a most intimate knowledge of the facts and the evidence I again assert upon my personal honor and I am willing to reiterate it before my Maker that there was not a single delegate in the Chicago convention who was not fairly entitled to a seat therein, and that consequently President Taft was honestly nominated. [Applause on the Republican side.]

During the delivery of the foregoing,

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask that the gentleman may have 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri may have 15 minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON. Reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire how much time has been allotted for this general debate.

Mr. MANN. Until half past 3 o'clock.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand there are gentlemen on this side of the House who wish to speak.

Mr. MANN. I think all gentlemen on that side have been arranged for.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will not object.

Mr. WARBURTON. The gentleman has refused to allow me to interrupt him, and I will object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman from Washington will not do that.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I am perfectly willing to yield to the gentleman from Washington at the end of my remarks. I told the gentleman I would be willing to yield to him then.

Mr. WARBURTON. Let the gentleman proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington withdraws his objection.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, how long has the gentleman from Missouri been addressing the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied the time of the House for an hour and a half.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. And we vote at half past 3?

Mr. MANN. We do not vote at half past 3, but the general debate will be closed at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order which has been agreed to, the general debate closes at half past 3.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] stated the proposition correctly when he said that there were a number of gentlemen on this side of the aisle who wished to speak this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has been approached by several gentlemen who desire time. The Chair states that in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Do I understand that the extension of the time of the gentleman from Missouri for 15 minutes will shut out any gentleman on this side of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. It will certainly consume that much of the remaining time.

Mr. JAMES. I understand the unanimous consent has been given.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. No; I am withholding my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. WARBURTON] withdrew his objection. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Mr. BARTHOLDT resumed and concluded his remarks.]

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, for the last few days I have been listening with a great deal of interest to the distinguished gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber in their efforts to justify the conduct of the present administration in the procurement of delegates at Chicago and also other gentlemen in their attempt to justify the conduct of another candidate who sought to procure delegates at Chicago.

When the American people first saw in the public press the reports of the outrageous conduct being carried on at Chicago in the struggle for these delegates they were slow to believe that any such conduct could take place between two men with such distinguished careers as the present President of the United States and the ex-President. For myself, I did not want to believe that such conduct could take place in any convention or in any assemblage in the United States of America. At first I did not believe all of the press reports of the conduct carried on there. But since the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT], and other gentlemen on the other side have stood up here on the floor of this House with carefully prepared manuscripts and verified every statement made by the papers as to the conduct and the practices of the "machines" in their efforts to procure delegates at Chicago and those individuals who were in charge of the campaigns of Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Taft, of course I can no longer say that I do not believe those reports.

Gentlemen on that side of the Chamber say that Mr. Taft bought or stole his renomination. I do not believe he did anything of the sort. I do not believe he bought his delegates with money. I can not believe that such corrupt practices as that would be used by a President of the United States. I do not believe that these gentlemen on the other side ought to make a scapegoat of the negro delegates from the South. I rise in my place to defend the Georgia nigger as much as anything else. [Applause.]

They say on that side that these delegates were of a questionable honesty, that these conventions held in Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Texas were irregular conventions. Why, Mr. Chairman, there was nothing irregular about them. They were conducted in the same way that the Republican Party has been treating the negro in the South ever since the war. They got these delegates to Chicago by the same well-oiled machine that they have been using ever since the days of reconstruction—by the Federal patronage route.

Now, I say they did not buy these delegates, and they did not have to steal them, for no man can commit a larceny upon his own property. Mr. Taft's managers had nothing to do with that; but I will tell you how they got them and how they have been getting them.

As a matter of fact, there are not, never have been, and, thank God, never will be enough Republicans in the State of Georgia or the South to count. The only delegates from Georgia who deserted Taft at Chicago were white delegates. One of those white delegates has held a Republican office for 16 years in the district that I have the honor to represent. He has been drawing a salary from the Federal Treasury of $5,000 a year. He went up to Chicago and he deserted the President, and went into the convention and voted for the gentleman who recently emerged from the jungles of Africa dragging a he tiger by the tail and a bull elephant by the snout. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, there must be some reason for a man of the intelligence of this man voting for Mr. Roosevelt, and I will tell you why he did it. I know him personally. He voted for Roosevelt because he knew that the election of Mr. Taft was absolutely impossible in November, he had nothing to lose, and he was out on a limb and it did not make much difference which way he jumped. He thought that ex-President Roosevelt by going throughout the country proclaiming from every stump that the bosses of this country were ruling it, and that they had the convention packed and stacked against him would make the American people listen to him, and that probably he would stand a chance of election. But now he has ruined his chances for election by going up here to Pittsburgh and selecting a manager and side partner, the man who did the work for him in Pennsylvania; and who did he get? He got a man by the name of Bill Flinn. I was in Pittsburgh in 1907 upon a visit. They carried me away upon a hill where the aristocrats live, and they pointed out to me a residence and they would say, that is owned by Mr. So-and-so, he is worth one hundred millions; he made it in steel. Then they would point out another one and say, that man is worth fifty millions, and he made it in steel.

Mr. BUCHANAN. S-t-e-a-l?

Mr. HOWARD. S-t-e-a-l and s-t-e-e-l, both. Finally they came to a magnificent residence and pointed it out to me and said, "That is hog wallow." I said, "What?" They said, "That is hog wallow." I said, "Who lives there?" And they said, "Bill Flinn, the municipal contract boss of Pittsburgh, lives there." They said that he was reputed to be worth millions, and that all of the money that he had made was made out of controlling the contracts for public work in the city of Pittsburgh. Roosevelt has written his O. K. on him, and the Colonel says that he is all right.

Why did Taft and Roosevelt fall out, and what did they fall out about? Just a few months ago they were calling each other "Dear Bill" and "Dear Theodore." They were consulting over the Canadian reciprocity act; they were the best of friends. One was saying what the other did was all right, and the first thing you know they had a fuss, and they fell out and then finally the ex-President said to himself, "I have got to vindicate myself, and the only way I can do it is to run against my good old friend Bill whom I made President three years ago." So he started out, and the first thing he did when he started out was to abuse the President. The President replied by saying, "I never did do a thing, Theodore, since I have been President, that I have not consulted you about, and you have always approved of everything I did." He further said, "You ought not to fall out with me; you know you made me what I am." But, Mr. Chairman, the Republicans had realized that they had to fool the people, and the best man on this earth to fool them with was the ex-President. They knew that he was the only man living who could rate the millionaire and the pauper side by side and make the pauper believe he loved him better than the millionaire. They thought that probably he could keep the Republican Party together, and if he could not they could have an excuse and go before the country the next session and say, "Well, if it had not been for Taft we would have won," and the Taft followers could say, "If it had not been for that fellow Roosevelt, we would have won." They expected to "come back" four years from now and rehabilitate the Republican Party and get into power again.

Mr. Chairman, this is the first time in the history of this country that a man like the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], one of the most distinguished Members of this House and one of the greatest leaders in the Republican Party, has been called upon to get up on the floor of this House and defend a Republican nomination. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] got up and denounced the action of the Taft followers in the late convention, calling them thieves, robbers, and so forth. He then proceeded to defend the action of Mr. Roosevelt at Chicago. Mr. Chairman, I have some information from one of the negro delegates to the effect that if the banks in Chicago and the banks all over this country would keep a sharp lookout they would see passing through their institutions many brand-new $500 and $1,000 bills that had been torn exactly in half and neatly pasted together in the middle. The history of these mutilated bills is not only unique but very interesting.

I am told that the bull moose delegate "herders" would approach a poor southern negro and pull from his pocket in a very indifferent manner a large roll of nice, new yellow-backed bills, and say to him, "Ephraim, I want to see you a minute. Ephraim, six of the leading white delegates from your State have come over to us, and they are all going over in the morning. Now is the day of your salvation. If you do not come now, you are going to miss the best opportunity you ever had in your life to get a big pile of money and get on the band wagon at the same time." And with this statement he just tore that thousand dollar bill in two, and the idea of tearing up money before Ephraim shocked his nervous system and he fainted. [Laughter.]

They had money there to tear up, and Ephraim could not stand it. When he came to this white man said to him, "Ephraim, you go into the convention in the morning and vote for McGovern, and here is half of this bill, and just as soon as you vote for him I will see that you get the other half." Ephraim did not have much confidence in half a bill, and he thought they were fixing to get him into the penitentiary and refused. He said, "No, boss, I got to see one of the gentlemen here before I do that," and he went to him and told him what had happened, and of course this man told him that he must not do it, and he kept an eagle eye on Ephraim ever afterwards.

This same nigger delegate tells me that another thing happened. The Taft managers had a lot of these Georgia darkies in a large room, called by the Republican managers the "bull pen," and one of them had been giving one excuse after another to get out. Every time he would say he wanted anything, somebody would go and get it for him. They thought the best thing to do was to keep him locked up. Finally he gave a very plausible excuse, and told them that he would not be gone more than about five minutes if they would let him out. They told him to go out and they let him out with a delegate from my district to watch him, but in some way or other in the crowd he evaded this man, and got lost from him and was gone about an hour and a half. He came back somewhat under the influence of what the darkies call down in my State "blue-steel corn." He fell on a cot and soon went to sleep. The official "herder" of these delegates, who was a very smart darky, said that the best thing to do was to search that nigger, for he had been up to some devilment, having been off too long. He was serenely sleeping on this cot and they proceeded to search him, and the first thing they ran across, carefully tied up in a red silk handkerchief, was a brand-new $500 bill, and they took it away from him.

He tells me they have got that bill yet, and the President got his vote the next morning, and you are going to hear from that bill in this campaign, gentlemen, I put you on notice, especially those of you who think your candidate was so saturated with the holy water of Republicanism that he could commit no wrong.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Did he have both halves?

Mr. HOWARD. This delegate had the whole bill. They bought him lock, stock, and barrel on the spot, and he agreed to deliver the "goods" the next morning. Now, when one of these candidates charges corruption against the other, it is like the pot calling the kettle black. Now, I said in the outset Mr. Taft did not buy his nomination with money.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand the gentleman from Georgia intimates the $500 was paid in whose interest?

Mr. HOWARD. In the interest of the bull moose candidate.

Mr. ROBINSON. And in whose interest was the torn bills given?

Mr. HOWARD. That was in the interest of the bull moose party also, so I am informed. I do not want to whitewash either of your candidates. You gentlemen have been seeking the truth, and it has been left for me to tell the whole truth about that convention, and I am going to give it to you.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman said a good deal about the conduct of the negro delegates at this Republican convention. Does not the gentleman think the negro delegates from the Southern States at this Republican convention behaved themselves about as well and as properly as the same number of white Republicans from the South would have behaved themselves?

Mr. HOWARD. I just stated that the negro delegates to the Republican convention, those who went there for the President and those who went there for Mr. Roosevelt behaved themselves better than the crowd of white men who went there to control them. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Chairman, I say that the present administration did not——

Mr. MONDELL. Is not it true in spite of temptation—and I judge from what the gentleman says there were some temptations—the colored delegates of the South, practically all of them voted according to their instructions?

Mr. HOWARD. Why, certainly; they had heard their "master's voice" before they left home.

Mr. AUSTIN. How about Banks, a delegate from your district?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. What do you mean?

Mr. AUSTIN. Did not he violate his instructions?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I said the negro delegates from the South behaved as well as the same number of white Republicans from the South would have behaved. I did not refer to Tennessee—simply in Georgia, Alabama, and those Southern States.

Mr. CONNELL. From the remarks the gentleman from Wyoming made the other day and what we have heard this last week of this particular convention it would appear that there was nobody behaving himself.

Mr. AUSTIN. I think the record will show that a greater number of white delegates from the South deserted President Taft than colored delegates. I know of two from the State of Alabama and two from Virginia.

Mr. HOWARD. Did not I say that as plain as I could use the English language?

Mr. AUSTIN. And the two white men from Alabama were postmasters.

Mr. PROUTY. I would like to inquire whether the gentleman considers that the colored delegates from the South to the Chicago convention demeaned themselves any better or any worse than the fellows from the South at the Baltimore convention.

Mr. HOWARD. Why, Mr. Chairman, the Baltimore convention was the most harmonious convention ever held in the history of this country. Why, the police force made the nomination at Chicago possible. You Republicans would not have a candidate at all if the police had not have knocked down a delegate every five minutes, while we got together and nominated one of the greatest men this country ever produced to bear the standard of our party, and what we will do to you in November will be a plenty.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HOWARD. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman wants to get Pennsylvania into this?

Mr. HOWARD. I do; she is already in it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to ask the gentleman one or two questions, if he will permit. Can the gentleman point to any congressional district, precinct, or division in the State of Mississippi in which the colored delegates from that State to the Republican convention voted the Republican ticket at the last general election?

Mr. HOWARD. In answer to that I must confess my ignorance of politics in Mississippi. I do not know what they did there in Mississippi, but I know that Mississippi is represented in this House by her most distinguished citizens, and they can answer any question concerning Mississippi. [Applause.] I am here to defend the Georgia negro, and that is what I got up for.

Mr. SIMS. My question comes in at that point.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will ask the gentleman about his own State. Can the gentleman indicate any particular precinct in his own district in which these colored Republicans voted at the last election?

Mr. HOWARD. Well, very few of them voted; very few, indeed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. One more question: Does not the gentleman think it is due to the House and to the country that this $500 man to whom he refers should be named and located so that proceedings might be taken——

Mr. HOWARD. I anticipate the question. I think he will be named, and I think some of that crowd over there on your side is going to name him, from what I hear. I think one officeholder under the present administration, who, drawing $5,000 a year from the Federal Treasury, has an affidavit from that man. Why should I become a witness against Republican debauchery in their conventions when we have so many witnesses who have already testified to the truth of the assertions I now make? We do not need to prove these statements. You have confessed to their authenticity.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think it is fair, if he has information of that kind, that he should name the bribers and name the bribee, so that proceedings might be brought against them?

Mr. HOWARD. You will get all of that. You may hear from that more than from anything else, and from your own crowd, too.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is something we want to know. We want to be fair on this side.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman has defended his Georgia negroes and others for not yielding to temptation. I want to ask how they or any other individual can be tested as to temptation when they keep them locked up so nobody can tempt them?

Mr. HOWARD. Well, they have had past experiences at these conventions. And I suppose at these big conventions, where there is so much turmoil and so much money and corruption, the best thing to do is to keep these delegates locked up; and I think it was a wise thing to lock up the Georgia delegates, and the Tennessee delegates, the Mississippi delegates——

Mr. AUSTIN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The delegates from my State were not locked up.

Mr. HOWARD. Well, Mr. Chairman, from the conduct of some of them they ought to have been locked up. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have been very liberal in yielding to these gentlemen——

Mr. SIMS. May I finish my question? What does the gentleman think of any party that selects delegates to the national convention in whom they have no confidence and have to keep them under lock and key?

Mr. HOWARD. I think that the place for my friend and for me to express any opinion as to that will be on the stump this year.

Mr. CANNON. What does the gentleman think of any party that allows one man from Nebraska, William J. Bryan, after eight majority votes cast for another candidate, to demand that the majority give way? If the gentleman will address himself to that a little while, he will clean his own house.

Mr. HOWARD. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. Bryan, did exert quite an influence at the Baltimore convention. It is to be expected that any man who has enjoyed the confidence of six millions of American voters would wield a wonderful influence in any convention. Whatever may have been his motives, there are those in our party who give him credit for being absolutely sincere. Of course, Mr. Bryan is a great statesman; he is very close to the masses of our people; and if we should follow Mr. Bryan we may do right, and you would promptly say that we do wrong. We do not try to please you in our conduct at conventions. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If we tried to please you, we would not have any hope of being in power in November. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Because of the fact that instead of trying to please you we try to please the great masses of the American people—we are going to be in power next March. While we have forgotten that we ever had any other candidate than the nominee; that great statesman; that man who makes no boasts of what he is going to do, but does it; that man who wears no yoke of a boss; that man who has proven his faith in the masses of the people by placing them in control and overthrowing every man who looks like a boss. While you standpatters and "Bull Moosers" are over there daily shaking your fists in each other's faces, yelling thief, robber, thug, and using sweet and mellifluous epithets.

Now, let us see about the conduct of the present administration at Chicago. I said they did not buy delegates with money. What has been the policy of the Republican Party in the South? You talk about a machine, you talk about crushing the life out of people that do not agree with you; what chance has any candidate of your party in the United States to get a single vote against the administration in power in the South unless they buy them lock, stock, and barrel?

Mr. MANN. If we could get a fair election, we would have many chances.

Mr. HOWARD. What did the gentleman say?

Mr. MANN. I say that if we had a fair election we would have plenty of chances.

Mr. HOWARD. A fair election? You have not any right to talk about fair elections. [Applause on the Democratic side.]. God in heaven knows if there is anybody on the floor of this House that ought not to talk about popular elections it is the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who hails from Chicago.

Mr. MANN. Where the Democrats run the election machinery.

Mr. HOWARD. I want to say a few words as to how these delegates came from the South instructed. I noticed one thing in this campaign, and I expect every Democrat on the floor of this House noticed it, and that was the absence from the councils of the stand-pat Republican Party's advisers of one Hon. Frank H. Hitchcock. The Post Office Department was the delegate machine of this administration. You could not have thrown a pigeon egg on the floor of that convention at Chicago without bursting on the head of a Federal officeholder. Mr. Chairman, I want to say here and now that the conduct carried on in the South in the appointment of postmasters, in the demotion of postal employees, in the promotion of postal employees, is a disgrace to a great Nation like ours. They have taken an honest, faithful public servant, and because of the fact that they could not dictate to that man his political affiliation they have dismissed him from the service on trumped-up charges by what they call "inspectors," or they have demoted him to the extent that his wife and children suffered for bread and he had to leave the postal service.

Now, let us see who these delegates were from the Southern States at Chicago. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] the other day, in giving a list of the delegates there, gave a correct and truthful version of the political status of these delegates in Chicago. Why, I have a Republican white postmaster in my district that spells "come" with a "k." He could not write his name so that any man on the floor of this House could read it, unless the Member knew whose signature it was. He is a man who has been noted for nothing else but his great control over the negroes in that particular county. And yet that man is a postmaster in that district, and in a town of over 1,800 inhabitants, and he is left there to wait on my constituents. But he could not do that. He could not make out a receipt for a money order; he could not make out a receipt for a registered letter; and, consequently, the postmaster of this town is his daughter. And this man is one of the bosses down there, and his chief associates are a crowd of these poor, ignorant darkies who believe that they will get something some day at the end of the Republican rainbow.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. HOWARD. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. ADAMSON. I understand the gentleman to be proceeding with absolute impartiality as against the bull elephant and bull moose?

Mr. HOWARD. Absolutely.

Mr. ADAMSON. And I wish to call your attention to the fact that there must be a mutual misunderstanding between you and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who sought to interrupt you a moment ago. You said they could not procure any delegates from the South without buying them. The gentleman from Illinois said they could if they would give them fair elections. You were talking about the selection of delegates to the Republican convention?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. Who is responsible if they do not have fair elections in those sections? Do the apocryphal ballot-box stuffers and bulldozers have anything to do with it?

Mr. HOWARD. Nothing in the world. If you did not get an honorable delegation in Chicago, it is because the honorable Frank Hitchcock snapped a cap and his gun did not go off.

Why, just a day or so before the Chicago convention appointments in the State of North Carolina were sent to the Senate for confirmation by the President. All at once we see him hastily withdraw them. The bull moose had cast his shadow in the old North State. Would these appointees stand the test? Some doubt must have been in the mind of the President. He was like the man who approached "Ephraim"; so he decided that it was safer to make these appointments after the convention than before. The goods were delivered, so the appointments were made.

You have got no right to complain about these delegates at Chicago from Georgia or from any other Southern State. You already had them. They were bought and paid for with Federal patronage to the great detriment of the postal service of this country; and a long-suffering public has said, "We have got enough of incompetent service, and we are going to put somebody else in your place." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, I say that you bought the Taft delegates with Federal patronage, and there is not a man on that side who will deny it.

Mr. AUSTIN. I want to say to the gentleman, if his remarks have reference to delegates from the second district of Tennessee, that he is grossly in error.

Mr. HOWARD. At the very outset of my speech I took particular pains to except the second district of Tennessee. [Applause.] No corruption, no taint on honesty, could exist with such a man as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN], who represents that district, living in it. [Applause.]

Oh, no; the gentleman will get right some day. He is engaged in bad business. But I see, sometimes, when the gentleman votes for the Wool Trust and for the Cotton Trust and for all these big octupuses, that he is ashamed of his work. I can see that the gentleman blushes when he does it, but he will get right. Tennessee, unfortunately, split up 50 years ago, and she has been split up ever since. But she is getting nearer and nearer together now, and in a few years the gentleman from Tennessee will look back upon the history of the old second district and say, "My God, what a mistake I did make when I represented that district as a Republican!" [Laughter.] Oh, how prosperous you would be if you were just a Democrat! [Laughter.]

Now, gentlemen laugh over there. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] defended the present administration the other day. I could not help thinking about that distinguished gentleman. How eloquently he pleaded for the administration! He said that everything done at Chicago was perfectly regular and legitimate. The idea of the President of the United States and the men representing him at Chicago stooping to do anything that was not fair! And then I remember how the gentleman pleaded for sheep last summer; how he pleaded for protection on wool; how he talked about the absolute necessity for this outrageous protection on all these woolen goods, and how little he said about the poor, shivering women and children who could not wear a single woolen garment upon their bodies because of the outrageous tax you had helped place upon these great necessities of life. Yet he says that we have got to have honesty and fairness in these elections.

Well, they had it, and I want to say something to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and to my distinguished friend from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY]. Oh, he is such a progressive Republican. He does progress so much. He is in favor of everything that is along the progressive line. He is like the toad frog that swallowed a buckshot and fell into the well. He progresses by jumping up 2 inches and falling back 4. [Laughter.] He is a great progressive, and he defended the administration the other day.

Now, if I had been the President, I believe if I wanted intellect and brains to defend me on the floor of this House, I would have selected without hesitation the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and the distinguished gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] and my distinguished friend from St. Louis, Mo. [Mr. BARTHOLDT]. But if I wanted Republicans with a record on which I would be willing to go before the country and say to the people, "These men, representing me on the floor of the House, have shown by their votes, on one or more occasions at least, that they were willing to give the common people a crumb from the table of protection," I would not select them. For he can not say that about the gentlemen I have referred to. No wall of protection is too high for the gentleman from Wyoming or the gentleman from Washington or the gentleman from Missouri. You can not impose any tax too outrageous on the American people for these three gentlemen to support with all their vigor and all their hearts.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am wandering away from my subject, which is so near and dear to my heart, and that is the Georgia negro. I must not get away from that. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. HOWARD. With pleasure, for a question.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman has criticized somewhat a postmaster in his district. I would like to ask the gentleman if he would be in favor of a law providing that postmasters should be selected through the classified service.

Mr. HOWARD. I will say to the gentleman that if I had no hopes of a Democratic administration coming in soon, I would readily agree with him. [Laughter and applause.] But as we Congressmen are going to have something to say as to who shall hand to our sweet women in the South and to those pretty girls in the South their letters in the future, I am "agin" changing the law. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I want to say to the gentleman that if he has his way some of "we Congressmen" on that side of the House will be with us but a short time.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not think the gentleman is a clairvoyant. I do not think the gentleman has any right to predict such a violent thing as the defeat of the Democratic Party again. Why, my dear sir, your grandchildren will be grayheaded and snaggle-toothed before you ever see a Republican again in the White House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why, the American people have just got onto your curves.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman again yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. HOWARD. I will yield for a question.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I gather from the gentleman's statement that he has been reading the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for several years past, because that statement appears regularly in the RECORD every four years.

Mr. HOWARD. I have never been a plagiarist in my life, and I have never been guilty of it here; and if the gentleman says that statement appears in the RECORD, I will withdraw it. I am not going to be guilty of what you gentlemen were guilty of in Chicago—stealing—and I will not steal anything, not even a prediction. I will not be guilty of such reprehensible conduct. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. You have been predicting Democratic success for the last 16 years.

Mr. HOWARD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I must close. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG], in a magnificent memorized speech, to which he devoted a long, long time, got up here the other day and said something about our nominee for President.

Of course, he made his case as strong as he could, and what did it amount to? It is all bosh. The people of this country do not believe, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] did not believe that Mr. Wilson ever in his life believed that a Chinaman was better than a Caucasian. But, as I say, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] made his case as strong as he could. Like the lawyer in court, with the gallows staring his client in the face, with the rope stretched and the noose made, he made the best appeal he could, and he jumped on the Democratic nominee for President. Now, let us see. Mr. Taft has not written any books. He does not need to write any books. Better than books, his cold-blooded acts in vetoing remedial legislation passed by the first session of the Sixty-second Congress are sufficient to write "No!" on the heart of every struggling American citizen in this country. Mr. Roosevelt has written a good many books. He wrote one in many volumes called the Winning of the West, and if you gentlemen want some campaign thunder you can find it there. There is no need to use it; you are just wasting your ammunition. But if you want to make a lot of fuss and do a lot of shooting, just for the sake of keeping up your courage, I remind you that if you peruse Col. Roosevelt's book, the Winning of the West, you will find where he compared the American farmer with the old cowboy of the sixties and seventies; not the cowboy of to-day, but the cowboy of those former days, who carried a pistol and drank liquor and played cards and killed folks and shot out the lights in the small towns, and broke up the grog shops in the villages. Col. Roosevelt said he would rather be "a bronco buster in the West than an American farmer with a dull intellect."

The farmers will appreciate that sort of talk. When the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] made his attack upon the present nominee of the Democratic Party he forgot that his champion had already had the death knell sounded for him and that the other man lay down in Hog Wallow, on the hills in Pittsburgh, with old Bill Flinn and has had his campaign financed by that great philanthropist, the man who has always attempted to right the wrongs of every poor man in this country, the man who has always stood ready and willing to come out and say, "Thus far shalt thou go in dealing with the poor men in this country and no further." That man is the Hon. George W. Perkins, the right-hand partner of Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, who, I am reliably informed, has underwritten a campaign fund of two and a half million dollars for the bull moose from the jungles with which to run his campaign.

But there is one other gentleman whom we ought not to forget. There is a newspaper published in Washington. It is a great paper. The only thing that I know that commends that paper to me is the fact that it has a mighty clever set of young men employed on it. They are very bright. I do not see how they can write such articles for that paper when they have instructions from their boss to do the very opposite to what their consciences dictate that they should do. But this man is saying all sorts of mean things about the Democratic candidate for the Presidency and about Mr. Taft. Well, he hopes for his reward. It is not money that he wants, because I understand he is worth over $30,000,000; but it is position that he wants, and I understand that if the bull moose candidate is elected President of the United States he will be the minister to the Court of St. James. So he is turning loose all of his influences, his magazines and his newspapers, on Mr. Wilson and Mr. Taft. This is the first time that I have ever seen in your ranks one man get up from one section, belonging to one faction of your party, and make charges which were absolutely true, and another member of the party, belonging to another faction, get up and charge the same sort of thing—fraud and corruption, and things of that sort, in your conventions—when both of you told the truth.

You are both telling the truth this time. So what hope can you hold out when you go home this fall, all you old Members who have been here for years and who have an extra number of these cedar boxes and books and things of that sort here. Do not take them all home at one trip. Take some with you when the present session of Congress adjourns and leave them at home, because you will be overloaded next March. The people are done with you. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Maybe one or two of you progressives may get back, but as I said here last summer a real, sure-enough, standpat Republican on that side of the House next year will look as big as a martin on a fodder pole. I imagine that my good friend, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], will have a long and lonesome trip home next spring. I imagine that probably some of the other distinguished gentlemen, who have adhered so conscientiously to the standpat principles, will have a powerful lonesome trip. You have my sympathy, gentlemen. We gave you an opportunity to do better. We brought you up where you could have taken the political sacrament with the Democratic Party, and you turned aside. You would not sup with us. Now, I am done with you. [Laughter.]

You fellows are divided into two camps, and each camp accuses the other of high crimes and misdemeanors, and I am satisfied that both factions are guilty of every charge made against you.

Here are Republican witnesses testifying to the bribery and corrupt methods indulged in by the Roosevelt faction and the Taft faction in the primary and at Chicago, and the American people believe that you are both guilty.

O, ye of many political sins and little faith, you remind me of the old negro preacher's camp-meeting hymn. It ran like this—

Your thoughts on awful subjects dwell,
Damnation and the dead.
O what hell-a-shus horrors hang
Around your guilty head.

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia has six minutes remaining, and that six minutes he yields to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD].

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest to my friend from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] that since there are but 26 minutes remaining, we make some agreement as to the time? I understand the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] is the only other Member who wishes to speak during the general debate.

Mr. TILSON. If the House will give consent, I am willing that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD] may have half the time and I the other half.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that he had agreed to recognize the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] for the last 20 minutes of this debate. The gentleman from Connecticut can divide the time between himself and the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. TILSON. There is no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD] is recognized for 14 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman from New Jersey conclude in that time?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I scarcely think so.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] may have 15 minutes after we commence the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule, so that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD] may have the additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] may occupy 15 minutes when the bill is taken up under the five-minute rule. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair understands that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD] is to be recognized for how long?

Mr. TILSON. For the remainder of the time under general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for 24 minutes.

[Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The request of the gentleman from New Jersey can not be entertained by the Chair for the reason the time was fixed in the House for debate.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HARRISON of New York having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the President of the United States having returned to the Senate, in which it originated, the bill (S. 4862) for the relief of certain persons having supplied labor and materials for the prosecution of the work of constructing the Corbett Tunnel of the Shoshone irrigation project, with his objections thereto, the Senate proceeded, in pursuance of the Constitution, to reconsider the same, and

Resolved, That the said bill pass, two-thirds of the Senate agreeing to pass the same.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 24450) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

LIMITATION OF HOURS OF EMPLOYEES ON PUBLIC WORKS.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 1, 2, and 3 of an act entitled "An act relating to the limitation of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon the public works of the United States and of the District of Columbia" be amended to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. That the service and employment of all laborers and mechanics who are now, or may hereafter be, employed by the Government of the United States or the District of Columbia, or by any contractor or subcontractor, upon a public work of the United States or of the District of Columbia, and of all persons who are now, or may hereafter be, employed by the Government of the United States or the District of Columbia, or any contractor or subcontractor, in constructing, maintaining, or improving a river or harbor of the United States and of the District of Columbia, is hereby limited and restricted to eight hours in any one calendar day; and it shall be unlawful for any officer of the United States Government or of the District of Columbia, or any such contractor or subcontractor whose duty it shall be to employ, direct, or control the services of such laborers or mechanics or persons employed in constructing, maintaining, or improving a river or harbor of the United States or of the District of Columbia, to require or permit any such laborer or mechanic or persons employed in improving, maintaining, and constructing a river or harbor of the United States or of the District of Columbia, to work more than eight hours in any calendar day, except in case of extraordinary emergency.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a committee amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] was given leave to address the House.

The CHAIRMAN. There was unanimous consent given to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] for 15 minutes, and under that order the gentleman is recognized.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I feel like apologizing to the House for obstructing the real business of the day—political speechmaking—by submitting at this point a few observations that are neither partisan nor political, as that word is commonly used, but relate to the comparatively unimportant subject of the national defense. What I have to say is on the subject of a national military reserve.

It has been the fashion of late—in fact, it always is in time of peace—to speak disparagingly of preparations for war. Even those who advocate, as a matter of common business prudence, a reasonable state of preparedness for war are often regarded as bloodthirsty ogres desiring war.

No one can detest more than I do war and its horrors. The time and place of my birth and early training combined to make me hate war with all the intensity of my being. No vocabulary, not even Gen. Sherman's, is adequate to describe it. He who could have it in his heart to desire war is worse than a traitor to his country; he is an enemy to his race. All the peace societies, congresses, and associations, having for their purpose the prevention of war, have my most cordial sympathy and best wishes. We all agree that wars are wrong, and it is so delightful to dream of a future in which war shall be no more. There is every reason why such a dream should come to pass and no good reason why it should not, and yet there is the fear lurking here, there, and everywhere of the rude awakening.

The experience of the past rests heavily in the other scale. The history of our own and other countries teaches another story. Since the establishment of our Republic not a generation has passed without seeing us at war, and within half the period of a generation every large country and a large majority of the small ones have been at war. It would be pleasant to regard all these instances as exceptions and to hold to the belief that henceforth all nations "shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks." It is really quite a shock to see that the workers in iron and steel of other countries are really otherwise engaged.

I am not one of those who believe that trade necessarily means war. It is and should be one of the strongest bonds of peace, and yet we can not ignore the fact that it has often meant war nor blind ourselves to the probability that it will cause war in the future.

To-day we stand among the foremost commercial aggressors of the world and one of the weakest of military powers. In the product of the smelter which converts our inexhaustible resources in minerals into commercial products, in the coal measures of Pennsylvania which supply the needs of the world in fuel, in the cotton belt which furnishes 70 per cent of the world's supply, in the grain belts of the great Mississippi Basin, in the cattle ranges of the West, we are producing the products of the world, by the sale of which we are more and more coming into competition with others, and our continued success in the struggle depends upon our ability to sell in the open markets of the world.

It is not a simple coincidence that the nation that has the greatest foreign trade has also the greatest navy. The navy did not make the trade; the trade resulted from natural conditions; and when trade became great enough it demanded a navy for its protection. It was good business policy to create the navy; no other consideration dictated the result.

It is not necessary to ask what nation has the greatest army. It is necessary only to locate the nation whose natural wealth is among the greatest and whose boundaries are the most vulnerable and accessible to adjacent competitors. It is good business policy to maintain an army for such a nation; no other consideration can prevail.

So it was good business policy to acquire Hawaii, Guam, and Alaska, because of their influence upon trade; good business policy to acquire the Philippines, because these islands lie upon the main trade route to the Orient and because possession of the Philippines means favorable trade relations with 400,000,000 people in China, who have not as yet developed the power to manufacture; good policy to free Cuba and to secure control of Porto Rico; and good policy to maintain the Monroe doctrine as to our neighbors to the south of us. That war may grow out of such a situation no person can doubt who is not infatuated with the theory that altruism governs the price of stocks on the exchanges of New York, Paris, and Berlin.

We have steel and iron products, cotton, cereals, minerals, and manufactured products to sell, and coffee, silk, rubber, and so forth, to buy. We must, as business men, maintain our markets and secure uninterrupted arrival of raw materials for our manufacturing plants. To accomplish this, when competition becomes sufficiently keen, it is essential that there be adequate military preparedness to secure respect for the just claims of our people. As the business interests of a city demand its police, so the business interests of the Nation demand an Army and a Navy commensurate with the firmness of its foreign policy and the magnitude of its foreign trade.

Fortunately the geographical position of the United States is such that hitherto there has been occasion for only a small standing Army. There should not be need for a large standing Army if proper use is made of our military resources. We have the men and we have the means. It is our duty to have them ready for use when needed. The problem which confronts us is one of being able to use readily, with the least waste possible, the resources at our command.

As business men we should solve that problem with the least expenditure from the Federal Treasury. A brief review of the history of the past suffices to indicate the weakness and the suicidal extravagance of the legislative policy or lack of policy heretofore pursued in connection with this subject.

In every war since Revolutionary times to 1898 we have trifled with short enlistments, bounties, and other dangerous policies until our national integrity has been all but sacrificed. Much of our history on this point is rather painful, so it is not my purpose to go into the details of the subject.

Suffice it to say that during the Revolutionary War we called to the colors 231,771 Continentals and 164,087 militia, a total of 395,858 soldiers, to oppose approximately 150,605 British soldiers. During the War of 1812 we called to the ranks 56,032 Regulars and 471,622 Volunteers, rangers, and militia, a total of 527,654 soldiers, while the greatest number of soldiers operating in the field against this army of Americans amounted to 55,000 British and Canadians; yet the history of that conflict is largely one of disgraceful defeats for our armies during a war which might have terminated in great national disaster had not the situation on the Continent of Europe restrained England from following up her advantages gained here.

Again, despite the experiences of 1776–1781 and 1812, the Mexican War saw us enlisting men for 3 months, 6 months, 12 months, and finally adopting the only safe policy of enlisting for the war. As a result of these mistakes we beheld the disgraceful spectacle of American soldiers demanding their discharges in the face of the enemy and returning to their homes in the United States, thus halting Scott's victorious columns for more than two months at Puebla, within three days' march of the enemy's capital, his army reduced to 5,820 effective men. Despite the fact that we called into the service for this war 31,024 Regulars and 73,532 Volunteers—total, 104,556 enlisted men—to overthrow approximately 46,000 Mexicans, yet so hampered was the commanding general in the field by the policy enunciated in the laws enacted by Congress that Gen. Scott was compelled to advance with a half-trained army of about 14,000 men, 3,000 of whom were sick or in hospital, upon the City of Mexico, defended by about 36,000 Mexicans provided with 100 cannon.

Never during the whole campaign could Gen. Scott muster upon the field of battle a force superior to that of the enemy, though the total enlisted force in the service of the United States at all times greatly exceeded the strength of the Mexican Army.

It would have seemed reasonable to believe that the experiences of this campaign would have served to correct the wasteful and dangerous policy of the past, but success blinded our statesmen to the very valuable lesson of that campaign, and the opening of the Civil War finds the President calling for 75,000 militia for three months. As a result of the lack of proper legislation we called into the service during the war a total of 67,000 regulars and 2,605,341 militia and volunteers.

During the continuance of the war all the errors of the past were repeated and even aggravated. The bounty system was utilized in its most vicious form, and the extent to which bounty jumping was practiced should suffice to warn all succeeding Congresses against legislation which may permit a repetition of scenes so shameful.

More conspicuous, however, than any other error during this long struggle was that of failing to provide any means of maintaining the ranks at their maximum strength in rifles. Instead, the strength of organizations was permitted to decrease until the power of combat had practically ceased to exist, and new organizations were created, supplied with all the costly machinery of administration, and were sent to the front to replace the fragments of veteran organizations whose commanders had become skilled in leadership, but who found themselves without troops to command. The value of their experience was disregarded, a premium was placed on ignorance, the Treasury was unnecessarily drawn upon, and the integrity of the Union was jeopardized. In successive appeals the Government called for 75,000 militia for three months, 100,000 volunteers for one year, and 42,834 volunteers for the war. To all of these calls the people responded with abundant enthusiasm.

On the 4th of July, 1861, the Government found at its disposal the following heterogeneous mixture of troops:

Regulars and volunteers enlisted for 3 months and for the war	225,000
Volunteers for the war	50,000
New regiments of the Regular Army	25,000
Total	300,000

Yet already the enlistments of the three-month men were expiring, and the Government at the outset of the campaign was compelled to deduct from its fighting forces 80,000, or 26 per cent of the enlisted men mustered in.

The disaster of Bull Run resulted in a call for 500,000 volunteers to serve for not less than six months nor more than three years. So enthusiastic was the response that in 1862 the Government believed that it had secured the service of all men necessary for the prosecution of the war and committed the fatal mistake of ceasing to recruit. The Army now amounted to 600,000 men, and the opinion prevailed that 200,000 men could march from Washington to New Orleans without opposition. All that was wanted was for some one to command "Forward, march." Had the directors of the Federal policy but turned to the record of our past experience they would have seen that means must be provided for supplying the fearful wastage in an aggressive campaign, and that if 600,000 men were needed to meet the enemy, every effort of the Government should have been directed toward maintaining that number on the battle front of the Nation's armies. But what happened? For answer let us turn to the Records of the Rebellion and open any volume covering the period of 1863. The campaign of Vicksburg will suffice for the purpose. On pages 579 and 580, volume 24, part 2, Records of the Rebellion, the report of Brig. Gen. Osterhaus, United States Army, commanding the Ninth Division, shows the following:

First Brigade:
Forty-ninth Indiana Regiment	307
Sixty-ninth Indiana Regiment	216
Seventh Kentucky Regiment	199
One hundred and twentieth Ohio Regiment	386
		1,108
Second Brigade:
Fifty-fourth Indiana Regiment	245
Twenty-second Ohio Regiment	266
Sixteenth Ohio Regiment	359
Forty-second Ohio Regiment	434
		1,304
		2,412

The minimum strength of two Infantry brigades should have been 7,840 enlisted men, and it should have been the policy of the Government to maintain them constantly at that strength by a process of recruiting conducted at the home depots; but no home depots existed.

Again, we find the following return of the Department of Tennessee, Maj. Gen. U. S. Grant commanding, on May 31, 1863, near Vicksburg, Miss.:

	Present for duty, enlisted men.	Aggregate present.	Aggregate present and absent.

Exact information as to arrival of recruits is not available, and exact comparisons are therefore not possible, but some idea of the operation of the system can be secured by comparision of the preceding table with the following taken from the Records of the Rebellion, volume 24, part 3, pages 567 to 568, as shown in the return of the Department of Tennessee, Maj. Gen. U. S. Grant commanding, for the month of July, 1863, one month after the rendition of the preceding report:

Grand totals, 9 divisions	36,274	50,018	70,336

A little more than one year had elapsed since recruiting had ceased, yet the average strength of a division present for duty, as seen from the above returns, was 4,031 enlisted men, whereas the minimum strength of a division in enlisted men (Infantry alone) should have been 11,760, and it should have been the business of the Government to maintain the recruiting system so as to supply the wastage as rapidly as it occurred. It is fruitless to say that the political situation compelled the President to call for the organization of new regiments to maintain the necessary force in the field. That which compelled his action was the lack of a system to feed the firing line, and as statesmen, profiting by the experience of the past, it is our sacred duty to see that such a system is provided for the future. We should treat the matter of Army organization as a purely business proposition and remove while we may the causes which will otherwise render certain a repetition of the conditions to which I have referred.

We have lived through one war since the dark days of the Rebellion, yet the experience of 1898 shows that practically all remains yet to be done. War was declared with Spain on April 21, 1898. On April 26 Congress added two companies to each regiment of Infantry, increasing the number of companies in each regiment from 10 to 12, and authorized enlistments to increase the Regular Army to 62,597 men; but again no machinery was in existence to supply the extra men demanded by the situation, and the returns from the field of battle show that we assaulted San Juan on the 1st day of July, 1898, with an average of 556 enlisted men in the Infantry regiments participating in the attack, whereas the enlisted strength of each should have been 1,272.

(Campaign of Santiago de Cuba, vol. 3, pp. 214, 215, 216, 217.)

It will be seen from the foregoing outline of history of our wars that the organization of the Army has always resulted in maintaining in the field a minimum organization in rifles requiring a maximum burden of overhead charges. In order that the exact effect of this policy in dollars and cents may be seen I have had drawn up in parallel columns an exact statement of the costs involved in maintaining 400,000 Infantry in the field, organized at full war strength according to the act of February 2, 1901, and in maintaining the same number of riflemen in the field organized into regiments of the same average strength as those engaged in the campaign of Santiago in 1898.

The following comparison is made of the cost of 400,000 Infantry (which means 368,000 rifles) in the field—(a) if organized with ranks full under the act of February 2, 1901; (b) if organized in regiments of the actual strength of those which participated in the campaign of Santiago:

(A) WAR-STRENGTH ORGANIZATION.

Difference in cost per year	169,625,920.00

The following table is presented to show how the cost per annum of maintaining a private soldier, which is used as a basis of calculation in the preceding table, is arrived at:

Subsistence, 365 days, at 24 cents per day		$87.60
Clothing:
Allowance for 3 years, $129.88. For 1 year	$43.29
Issue on memorandum receipt of 2 blankets, $2.65 each, $5.30. Life of blanket, 6 years. Cost for 1 year	.88
Overcoat, $12.38. Life of garment, 6 years. Cost for 1 year	2.06
Sweater, $2.66. Life of garment, 6 years. Cost for 1 year	.44
Poncho, $2.72. Life of garment, 3 years. Cost for 1 year	.91
Miscellaneous	.23
Total for 1 year		47.81
Fuel		8.00
Transportation, average for the entire Army		22.20
Mounts, average for the entire Army		6.20
Quartermaster supplies, average wear and tear		10.44
Sanitary supplies		9.37
Ordnance, worn out in service		19.31
Total		210.93

The total in the table here presented does not include the cost of barracks nor the heating and lighting of same, as this calculation pertains to the cost incident to maintaining troops in the field only.

For the benefit of those who have not the time to fully examine the tables the following summary is made:

	Per annum.
Cost per rifle, Spanish-American War	$1,025.01
Cost per rifle, ranks filled	564.07
The difference in cost per rifle	460.94

It will therefore require $169,625,920 more per year to maintain 400,000 Infantry in the field (368,000 rifles) with regiments depleted as in the Spanish-American War than to maintain the same number of Infantry in the field with the same number of rifles if the ranks be filled to war strength, as authorized by law. Such expenditures as these will drive us to bankruptcy if we are again confronted with a war of long duration. Some system must be developed to avoid this suicidal extravagance.

It is scarcely necessary to say to business men that it is far better to create in time of peace all the machinery necessary to accomplish the desired results in time of war. The problem is not a simple or easy one, but is one well worth the conscientious study of serious-minded men. For more than a year I have been giving the subject special attention and have come to the conclusion that the most important element in the proper solution of the problem is the creation of a proper military reserve. Therefore, on May 15, 1912, I introduced a bill, H. R. 24601, to provide for a national military reserve.

In my humble judgment that bill enacted into law will produce results far-reaching in their character and beneficent in their operation touching the national defense of this country. The basic fact upon which the proposed bill rests is that with our Army and militia as at present constituted we each year discharge into civil life a large number of trained Regulars and twice as many more trained militiamen, a large percentage of whom may be utilized for filling the ranks to war strength within a few days after the outbreak of war, if a rational system be developed in time of peace for accomplishing this result.

Under the provisions of the bill only such number of these men as may be necessary to fill the ranks of the Army and of the militia to war strength belong to the active or class A reserves, the remainder to the inactive or class B reserves.

In response to a Senate resolution the Secretary of War under date of January 15, 1912, transmitted to the Senate certain information relative to Army enlistments for the 10 years ending June 30, 1911, which is published as Senate Document No. 259, Sixty-second Congress, second session. In this document it appears that for the 10 years the average number of men discharged by reason of expiration of term of enlistment is 18,103, of which an average of 10,219 reenlist. This leaves approximately 8,000 to be discharged annually into class A reserve.

In figuring the number of reserves necessary to raise the authorized peace strength of our Army to the war strength, the Philippines, Hawaii, Panama, and Alaska may be left out.

The garrison in the Philippine Islands is to be maintained at war strength. It is highly improbable that soldiers discharged from regiments in Hawaii, Panama, or Alaska will remain in the vicinity for a sufficient period of time to form an active reserve sufficiently numerous to raise these regiments to war strength. The necessary men for this purpose must be secured by drafts upon class B reserves and by shipments from general recruiting depots in the United States. The question, then, as to the organization of a reserve will be considered here as relating to the garrisons in the United States only. The following table indicates for these organizations the reserves needed to bring them up to war strength:

Organization.	Authorized strength.	War strength.	Number of reservists needed to expand to war strength.
16 regiments of Infantry	870	1,836	15,456
12 regiments of Cavalry	855	1,236	4,572
4 regiments of Field Artillery	877	1,186	836
Coast Artillery Corps	18,471	19,147	676
Engineers	2,002	1,942	60
Total number of class A reserves needed			21,600

As approximately 8,000 men will be discharged annually into class A reserves, in a period of three years there will be available more than the necessary number of reservists to fill the ranks of the Army to war strength. Under section 6 of the bill this is done automatically by adopting a contract of enlistment requiring three years with the colors and three years with the active reserves. Upon the completion of six years' service—three with the colors and three with the reserves—all further obligation under the oath of enlistment ceases.

In order that it may be known exactly what force may be relied upon in case of war, and in order that a high degree of proficiency in field training may be assured, it is desirable that the active or class A reserves be required to join the organizations to which they belong once each year for 10 days' field training. The feasibility of doing so is dependent principally upon the cost, which may be estimated as follows:

The reservists will be scattered over the entire country. This distribution, for the purposes of rough calculations, may be assumed to be uniform. The zone in which reservists from any garrison will be located may be determined by drawing a line through points midway between the posts and the next garrison. As shown in the table of distances between posts, which I insert in the RECORD without reading, it is found that, assuming a uniform distribution of reservists, each active or class A reservist would travel an average distance of 87½ miles in joining his organization, or 175 miles in joining his organization and then returning to his home. The cost of assembling 21,600 active reservists for 10 days' training would then be as follows:

Rations—21,600 men, at 24 cents a day for 10 days	$51,840
Pay—21,600 men, at 55 cents a day for 10 days	118,800
Transportation—21,600 men, 175 miles, at 2.262 cents per mile	86,400
Total	257,040

If, in addition to the above, the active reservists be allowed $2 per month, or $24 per year, the annual pay for this purpose will amount to $518,400, and the total cost of assembling the reservists for 10 days' training and of paying them at the above rates will amount to $775,440 annually.

Mr. ROBINSON. Might I ask the gentleman what will be the expense if the reserve is not called into the service?

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman means if it is not called into maneuvers?

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I mean the current expenses contemplated by the gentleman's bill.

Mr. TILSON. The current expenses contemplated by the bill when not called into service would be $775,000 per year, which is sufficient to maintain every organization in the present Army at a real war strength. The gentleman will understand that our peace strength is much less than what our war strength is. This bill would carry the peace strength of each organization in the ranks and the war strength on the rolls, the men making up the difference being in a state of furlough, instead of being present with their organization.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then in time of peace we really add $775,000 annually to the expense?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; in case reservists attend maneuvers 10 days, but in case they do not this would be decreased about one-third. In other words, it costs a little over $500,000 to maintain the reserve without maneuvers, but I consider the 10 days' training each year to be very important.

The transportation and subsistence furnished a soldier on discharge includes his actual railroad transportation, tourist sleeper accommodations, and rations commuted at the rate of 50 cents per meal and three meals to a day.

The following is a table showing the actual cost of transportation and subsistence between certain central points:

	Railroad fare cost to Government.	Miles.	Tourist sleeper.	Commutation rations.	Cost per mile.
San Francisco to—
New York	$59.77	3,191	$7.20	$7.50	$0.0233

From data gathered by inquiry of a large number of soldiers it appears that the emoluments in the bill are sufficient to secure the active reserve desired. The maintenance of an active reserve sufficient to fill the ranks of the Army to war strength at the outbreak of war would therefore cost $775,000 per year, and only $518,400 if the reserves are not annually assembled for a 10-day encampment.

The difficulty of keeping track of reservists has been suggested as an obstacle in the way of the establishment of such a reserve. To administer the affairs of those men by direct correspondence with the War Department would probably prove impracticable. The highest officer charged with the administration of such affairs should be the division commander, who should have authority to transfer reservists from one division or one regiment to another in his division, as they change their residence, and to transfer the records of reservists accordingly. Only such correspondence as must come to the War Department in the case of enlisted men at the present time should come to the War Department in the case of reservists.

For practical purposes the localization of regiments will be accomplished as soon as the garrisons for the Philippine Islands, Hawaii, and Panama have reached their prescribed stations. Reservists for each regiment in the United States may then be drawn from a well-defined area which will never change. Under such circumstances the local commanding officer is the official most interested in the maintenance of a local reserve, and it is he who should correspond directly with the local reservists, the latter forming an actual part of his command to be carried on his company reports and returns just as members of his actual command at the present time are carried.

In each company the necessary equipment should be on hand for each reservist pertaining to that company, who should receive his equipment when he reports for his annual field work, just as is now done in a militia company when men report for drill.

Under this plan reservists become furloughed members of companies, with reduced pay, and are required to serve annually only 10 days with their organizations. No extensive change in the existing system of administration is either necessary or desirable.

What has been said of reservists for the Regular Army applies, with some modifications, to the militia. Neither The Adjutant General of the Army nor the adjutant general of a State should be required to keep track of such reservists, except by means of the usual company and other reports now required. Finally, if the enlistment period for both the Regular Army and the Organized Militia be made six years, three of which are to be served with the colors and three to be served on furlough with the active or Class A reserves, then the obligation of the reservist to return to the colors when so ordered by proper authority will be the same as that imposed by the Articles of War upon any soldier furloughed from his regular command.

A sufficient number of class A reserves may be maintained to fill the ranks to war strength, but more men will be necessary to repair the losses in campaign and to form the nucleus of volunteeer regiments. Such men are provided for in the inactive or class B reserves. They should utilize for the purposes of organization, training, and equipment the plant and all the established machinery of Government employed by the Regular Army. Thus, barracks, reservations, and camp sites vacated by the Regular Army when the first line moves to the front would become points of mobilization for class B reserves and for volunteer organizations. Such reservists should be made up of enlisted men discharged from class A reserves and of enlisted men of at least three years' service in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps who have been honorably discharged, except for physical disability, all of whom should be required to take a proper oath of enlistment requiring them to join the colors upon proclamation by the President announcing that their services are needed. These men, being in excess of the statutory strength of the Army, should not be carried upon the rolls, but in order that exact information may always be available as to their strength, separate lists of class B reserves should be made out by organization commanders in whose districts they reside, and such lists, showing names, addresses, etc., of the reservists, should be forwarded periodically to the War Department.

The provisions of the bill relating to the enlistment of class B reserves are sufficiently broad to permit the Secretary of War to take the necessary steps to provide for the organization of such reservists into tactical units in time of peace and to permit the assignment of commanders and reserve officers thereto; and it is provided that the President may, by proclamation, direct the mobilization of class B reserves at points prepared in time of peace for their reception. Officers of class B reserves provided for in the bill should be drawn from the local regiments of the Regular Army, from graduates of military institutions at which Army officers are retained as professors of military science and tactics, and from other sources. Officers of the Regular Army are to be assigned to the reserve, whereas officers drawn from other sources are to be actually commissioned therein in the grades of captain and first and second lieutenant.

Membership in class B reserves carries with it no right of retirement or retirement pay, or pay or allowances of any kind, but upon proclamation by the President directing the mobilization of reserves, officers commissioned in such reserves pass at once into active service as volunteers with the organizations to which they belong.

There will be no difficulty in officering class B reserves without additional expense to the National Treasury, but in order to keep the ranks filled some advantage should accrue to the soldier who places his name upon the rolls.

Nothing can justify a return to the bounty system practiced in the wars to which reference has already been made. No greater mistake could be made than that of offering or paying a lump sum to any former soldier who presents himself upon the outbreak of war. Such a system invites a return to all the disgraceful scenes, the shameful dishonesty, and the hopeless confusion which characterized the bounty period of the Civil War. The adoption of such a plan would ultimately compel the Government to offer a similar bounty to all who enlisted for the war and would, in the event of a great war, add billions to the cost of our campaigns. In my judgment we may escape all of this and still secure the men we desire by following the sound and well-established policy which now prevails in the Regular Army of paying an increased wage to the men of superior experience. Thus the private of Infantry receives $15 per month in his first enlistment, $18 in his second enlistment, $21 in his third enlistment, and an increase of $1 per month thereafter for each enlistment until in his seventh enlistment, when he receives $25 per month. This principle is incorporated in the sections of the bill providing for the organization of class B reserves. A reasonable inducement is thus offered to enlist in such reserve and to remain therein in time of peace, for such reservist, if called in the event of war, will receive a better wage than his brother in arms who declines to become a reservist.

In section 5 provision is made for officers to command the skeleton organization of the class B reserves. Commissions are to be given only to captains and first and second lieutenants. The principal source of supply will be the militia and the military schools at which officers of the Army are detailed as instructors. Graduates of such schools have received the basic education for a military profession, but many of the benefits resulting therefrom are lost because we have no means of utilizing them. The section of the bill touching this subject is drawn along the lines adopted for the formation of the Medical Reserve Corps of the Army, which has already produced most satisfactory results. The assignment of not more than four officers of the Regular Army to each regiment of class B reserves will permit the use of the whole machinery of the regular establishment for preserving the records, providing the equipment, and perfecting the organization in time of peace of a trained force which could be called into the service.

The force thus created preserves all the features of a volunteer organization, utilizing the regular service only to the extent which experience has shown to be necessary in order to secure efficiency. With such an organization all of the arms, equipment, and so forth, for a volunteer organization may be accumulated in time of peace at the point of mobilization, and, under the provisions of section 11 of the bill, the necessary depots may be established at such points in order that recruitment may never cease and that a steady flow of enlisted men may be maintained to keep the organizations at the front always filled to their maximum strength with fighting men, thus avoiding a repetition of the experience of 1863 and 1898.

The labor involved and the time consumed in keeping track of class B reserves would probably be too great to require of officers of the National Guard, though they may be properly expected to keep track of class A reserves for their own organizations. Therefore no class B reserve for the militia is provided for in the bill.

Finally, in order that the Government may never lose the service of a man by the expiration of enlistment almost immediately after the outbreak of war, it is provided that all enlistments in the Army, the Organized Militia, and in class A and class B reserves shall, regardless of the time of their beginning, continue in force for one year unless the war sooner terminates. A provision is also added to the effect that nothing in the act should be construed to shorten the prescribed period of enlistment.

With this bill enacted into law and its provisions thoroughly worked out we could confidently rely upon each organization of our Army and Militia being ready at all times should an emergency suddenly arise to take the field at once with ranks filled to war strength with well-trained men. If the emergency should prove to be a serious one, we might expect to see within a few weeks an additional organization made up from class B reserve mobilized at the same place from which the original organization had moved out and ready to follow it to the front.

And bear in mind that only men already trained for their duties are thus far included. The importance of this feature of the plan can be fully appreciated only by those who have kept pace with the rapid development of firearms and the complete revolution in military tactics made necessary by the use of long-range, high-power, rapid-fire rifles and the still more wonderful improvement in artillery. Fifty years ago soldiers made the attack shoulder to shoulder. It would be suicide now. Then the trained men could carry with them by physical contact the untrained. Now, unless each individual soldier knows his duty, there is danger of his lack of training seriously impeding the others.

The plan which I have attempted to outline is in line with the true conservation spirit of our times. With comparatively small expense to the Federal Treasury it undertakes to gather up and keep ready for use when needed that greatest of military resources, heretofore almost disregarded, the men trained at great expense to fight our battles.

I close as I began by saying that I detest war. I do not believe it is imminent and earnestly pray that our people may be delivered from it throughout the years to come. Yet my duty as a Member of this House and of the great Committee on Military Affairs has brought me to consider these questions as a practical man and legislator, and not as an idealist or a dreamer. If I, with my responsibility resting upon me, should close my eyes to facts as they exist and be content to fold my arms in supplication that war may never come again, and then it should come and find my country unprepared, I should surely feel myself subject to the reproach of being an unfaithful as well as unprofitable servant. It is in that spirit I bring these observations upon a bill which I believe will accomplish much toward the solution of one of our serious problems, that of a proper, reasonable, and adequate national defense. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TILSON. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 12, by inserting after the word "day" the following: "Which eight hours shall terminate within nine hours from the beginning of workday."

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman desire to have that amendment adopted in the form in which it is?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes; I think it is absolutely necessary because of the statement received from the War Department, and indeed testimony given before the committee, that they work in some cases 12 to 16 hours, and this amendment is necessary in order to correct that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if he will not accept an amendment to his amendment, reading as follows:

At the end of line 12, page 2, insert:

"Within nine hours from the beginning of workday, except in the case of service which is by its nature noncontinuous, or which requires only a portion of the employee's time, or which is required only for brief periods at intervals; and it shall be unlawful for any officer of the United States, or——

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would not agree to an amendment of that kind. That amendment would destroy the entire purpose of the bill. As I stated in reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], there are many of these workmen whose work is not continuous, although they are on duty continuously, and it has been stated to the committee in the hearings, and it is also stated from the War Department, that there are many of these men who do not now work more than eight hours, and yet they are continuously on duty from 12 hours and upward. So that with the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] the entire purpose of the bill would be destroyed. I have no objection whatever to an amendment which would exclude from the operations of this bill men who are engaged in tending locks, because there are many of those who are not burdened with arduous duties, who only have to tend to the locks two, three, or four times a day, and the remainder of the time they do not have to be on duty because they can be notified in plenty of time in advance of a vessel approaching the locks and attend to their duties there. I have no objection to an exception being made to that class of men, if that is the purpose of the gentleman, but I have an objection to the amendment in the form in which it is presented.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to the committee, while I do not intend myself to press this amendment unless the gentleman will accept it, the suggestion was made to me by the Chief of Engineers. I called attention to this matter last Wednesday, when this bill was under discussion, referring at the time to a communication I had from the Chief of Engineers on the subject, and I am going to ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD and insert this document, as also a statement which I have since received from the same source, embracing several amendments to the bill, which that official thinks and which I believe should be adopted. One of these I have just read. I would like to insert both of these statements in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting certain papers to which he has referred. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The papers referred to are as follows:

[Memorandum on H. R. 18787, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, July 22, 1912.

1. The Chief of Engineers desires to invite attention to certain features of H. R. 18787, amending the act of August 1, 1892 (27 Stat., 340), which was favorably reported to the Committee of the Whole House on June 18, 1912, from the Committee on Labor, with a committee amendment in lines 12 and 13 of page 2 of the bill, as follows: "which eight hours shall terminate within nine hours from beginning of workday."

2. The hearings on this bill by the Committee on Labor February 20 to March 9, 1912, show that the intent of the bill, as stated by the Hon. W. B. WILSON, by whom it was introduced in the House, is to regulate "the hours of labor of men working on the steam shovels, the dredges, and the tugs on the Great Lakes and other seaport towns in possession of the United States," such employees having been declared by the Supreme Court of the United States in Eastern Dredging Co. v. the United States and Bay State Dredging Co. v. United States (206 U. S., 246) to be beyond the purview of the act of August 1, 1892. The wording of the bill itself, however, is much broader than its declared purpose indicates, and covers "all persons who are now or may hereafter be employed by the Government of the United States or the District of Columbia or any contractor or subcontractor in constructing, maintaining, or improving a river or harbor of the United States and of the District of Columbia." It will be seen that this language covers not only the dredge workers for whose benefit the bill was introduced, but, while applying only to laborers and mechanics in other branches of the service, it applies to all employees engaged on river and harbor work, of whatever class and designation, no matter what may be the conditions of their employment. It will restrict the service of all masters, mates, and crews of all vessels—cooks, cooks' helpers, teamsters, and stablemen, and hostlers, the operating forces at locks, and many other employees whose occupation requires them to be subject to call at irregular hours or at times outside the regular working day. The conditions of employment of such persons differ radically from those of the ordinary laborer or mechanic at work in factory, shop, or mine, or on buildings or other works on shore. The latter begin work at a fixed hour, work continuously, and, except for the noon hour, without interruption for eight hours, and is then free to go to his home until the hour for returning to work next day. The application of the eight-hour law to such employees presents no difficulty, and the proposition that it is in principle economically sound is not here questioned, but for the other classes of employees described above the conditions are different and the application of the eight-hour law as proposed by the committee will present great difficulty.

3. These employees fall in two general classes: First, those whose employment is irregular and who may be called on to render service for short periods at intervals throughout a fairly extended tour of duty, the aggregate amount of labor in 24 hours, however, being small; and, second, those who are regularly required to render service before and after the regular working hours, with a period of idleness during the regular working day. Among the first class are lock attendants and operatives on rivers and canals, where the actual amount of work required is less—sometimes very much less—than eight hours per day, but service may be required at irregular intervals, depending upon the arrival of boats desiring to pass through the locks. These men live in Government quarters at the locks, and, except when actually needed to operate the lock to permit the passage of vessels, their time is entirely their own. They are paid by the month, regardless of the amount of work done, and their aggregate service is not usually at all burdensome. In the same class are watchmen and persons in supervisory positions, and other positions of responsibility, who are liable to be called upon at any hour and whose service can not be confined to the hours of a regular working day, such, for example, as masters and chief engineers of vessels, who, under maritime law, are at all times responsible for matters falling within their several jurisdictions and can not shift this responsibility to others. These men must be subject to call at any hour when the need for the exercise of their functions arises. The same is true of assistants in responsible charge of any important work.

4. The second general class of these employees comprises those whose employment requires them to render service before and after the regular hours of a working day in order that the main force may work a full day, but who can be, and are, relieved from duty part of the time during the day. Among these are employees who start the fires and get up steam before working hours in the morning and bank the fires and clean up for the night after the day's work is done; cooks and waiters, hostlers, stablemen and teamsters, boatmen under certain conditions, and others. Under the present law the employment of such persons is considered to be in conformity with law if the aggregate amount of service rendered does not exceed eight hours per day, though the eight hours may not be consecutive. If the pending bill should pass, they can not be called upon to render service after the expiration of nine hours from the time they first begin work, regardless of the amount of leisure intervening.

5. With regard to all of these men it may safely be said that, except in emergencies, none of them perform more than eight hours of work per day. So far as this office knows, there is no general complaint among employees of either of these classes as to their present conditions of employment and no general demand among them for any further legislative restrictions upon their services.

6. The bill now under consideration, especially the committee amendment requiring that every man's work must be performed within nine hours of the beginning of the workday, will require that in almost all cases of irregular employment, as described above, additional men must be provided, so that no man will be subject to call during more than 9 hours of the 24. At all locks three complete operating shifts will be required, since boats are liable to pass at any hour, although there may not be more than two or three lockages per day. There are no quarters for the additional men, and to provide quarters and to pay the additional men will very largely increase the cost of operating the locks and, in many cases, will result in the establishment of what will be practically a free salary list. Cooks and waiters must also be doubled, since under the proposed legislation those who prepare and serve breakfast will not be available to prepare and serve supper and clean up the kitchen for the night. A double force of stablemen and hostlers will be required, since the man who feeds the animals in the morning can not be required to feed them at night, more than nine hours later, although he may have done nothing in the interval; and, in short, double shifts will be required for every class of work and in every case when the work now done by one shift can not be entirely completed within nine hours from the time of beginning. This will, in many cases, result either in paying two men to do one man's work or in reducing the effective hours to considerably less than eight. For example, tugs tending dredges, which may be required to place the dredge in position for work in the morning, to move it as needed during the day, and perhaps return it to its moorings at night, or changing crews when shifts are made, must usually be operated for approximately an hour before the dredge begins to dig in the morning and an hour after the dredge ceases at night. During the day, however, the tug may be idle a good part of the time. If the work of the tug's crew must be performed within nine consecutive hours, either the work of the dredge will be cut down to approximately seven hours or a double crew must be shipped on the tug to do one hour's work. Either of these alternatives is economically unsound. The same considerations apply to tugs and scows engaged in the disposal of material excavated by dredges, especially when a long tow is required. The work on these boats is intermittent and the periods of rest aggregate a considerable part of the day.

7. These remarks concerning the operation of tugboats apply with almost equal force to the operation of the dredges themselves. Owing to the time necessarily consumed in getting into position to work in the morning, time lost by delays and interruptions during the day, and the time consumed in pulling out of the cut and tying up at the moorings for the night the dredge must be under steam and its crew ready for duty for approximately 10 or 11 consecutive hours in order to secure 8 hours of actual dredging work. This matter was fully examined into in connection with dredging operations on the Great Lakes last year, and the reports from all the officers in charge of such work were unanimously to the effect that under present conditions of operation no man on either the dredges or the tugs does regularly more than 8 hours of actual work in the course of the working day and that from 2 to 3 hours or more of the period between the time the crew is called to work in the morning and the time they quit at night is lost through the causes mentioned. To restrict the period of service of each member of the crew to within 9 hours from the beginning of the workday will therefore either cut down the time of actual work of the dredge and of the individual members of the crew to less than 8 hours or will require the employment of an additional shift of men. It should be remembered that these employees are paid by the month and are not subject to loss of pay for lost time, even though the dredge be tied up doing nothing, and that, except in a few cases, they live on the dredge during the time she is in commission. The time occupied in placing the dredge in position for work and moving her out of the cut at night is analogous to the time occupied by the laborer or mechanic ashore in going to and from his place of employment. This time is not counted as part of his day's work, the beginning of which must find him in his appointed place ready to render useful service, and at the end of which—and then only—he is at liberty to leave that place. By analogy it would seem fair to count the time of the dredge worker as beginning when the dredge pump is started or the dredge dipper makes its first swing and as ending when actual dredging stops at the end of the day.

8. The bill, if passed, will apply to the construction and repair of levees and revetments on navigable rivers of the United States, whether done by hired labor or by contract, and will thus operate to nullify the exception made with regard to contracts for such work in the act approved June 19, 1912 (Public, No. 199, H. R. 9061, this Congress). Moreover, as amended by the committee it will prevent the practice followed in some places of beginning work early and "laying off" for more than one hour in the heat of the day.

9. Another feature of the matter is the fact that the bill as drawn will apply the eight-hour law with the nine-consecutive-hour limit strictly to all members of the crews of all vessels employed on river and harbor work, including not only dredges but dispatch boats, tugboats, inspection boats, and work boats of all kinds. These men are universally admitted to be seamen and are now subject to the same conditions of employment as other seamen. This bill as drawn therefore singles out from among all seamen employed by or on behalf of the United States those particular seamen who are engaged upon one particular kind of work, under one particular branch of the Government service, and makes them a favored class under the law, thus creating among seamen the same kind of discrimination between classes as is now complained of by the dredge employees, whose claim is that they are virtually artisans and laborers and that under present interpretations of the law they are less favored than men in similar lines of work on shore.

10. In view of the considerations above advanced, it is suggested that if the bill be passed it be first amended by the omission of the committee amendment requiring every man's work to be completed within nine consecutive hours, and by changing the phraseology "all persons * * * employed * * * in constructing, maintaining, and improving a river and harbor," so as to make it apply only to operators of dredging machinery who live on shore and simply go on board the dredge during the day to perform their day's work. This will accomplish the purpose for which the bill was introduced without involving far-reaching complications, the extent of which can not be fully seen. It will distinguish between persons who are engaged simply and solely for the mechanical work of digging a channel and persons who are engaged to navigate vessels; and it will avoid singling out the employees of one department of the Government for special favor above employees of similar classes who do similar work for other branches of the Government service.

W. H. BIXBY,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

[Memorandum on H. R. 18787, which is a bill to amend the eight-hour law of August 1, 1892.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, July 30, 1912.

1. The following amendments are recommended:

a. In line 10, page 2, change "and" to "or," to agree with phraseology in other parts of bill.

b. In line 9, page 2, strike out "in constructing, maintaining, or improving a" and substitute "to perform services similar to those of laborers and mechanics in connection with dredging (snagging, or rock excavation), in any," so as to make the clause read, "and of all persons who are now or may hereafter be employed by the Government of the United States or the District of Columbia, or any contractor or subcontractor, to perform services similar to those of laborers and mechanics in connection with dredging (snagging, or rock excavation), in any river or harbor of the United States or of the District of Columbia." Same amendment in lines 17–18, and in line 21, page 2, and in lines 8–9, and in lines 23–24, page 3.

NOTE.—The object of the bill is to bring within the protection of the eight-hour law the dredge workers who by the decision of the Supreme Court on May 13, 1907, were declared not to be "laborers or mechanics employed on any of the public works of the United States" within the meaning of the act of August 1, 1892. The amendment suggested will cover these men without going so far as to embrace a large variety of other employees the conditions of whose employment are such that they do not need the protection of the proposed law.

c. In line 13, page 2, after "workday," insert "except in the case of service which is by its nature noncontinuous, or which requires only a portion of the employee's time, or which is required only for brief periods, at intervals," so as to make the clause read, "which eight hours shall terminate within nine hours from beginning of workday, except in the case of service which is by its nature noncontinuous, or which requires only a portion of the employee's time, or which is required only for brief periods, at intervals."

NOTE.—In the ordinary case of regular continuous manual labor which this bill is designed to cover, the time and attention of the employee must be given to the work from the time he begins work in the morning until he quits at night, except for the noon stop for dinner. There are, however, many cases among "all persons employed in constructing, maintaining, or improving a river or harbor" in which the work is necessarily intermittent, and the employee has time during the day that is at his own disposal for his own private affairs, or in which incidental service of minor character must be rendered before or after hours. Among employees of this character are cooks, cooks' helpers, waiters, servants, messengers, day and night watchmen, lock masters and lock employees, light keepers on the western rivers, whose duty it is to light the lights at nightfall and extinguish them in the morning, and keep the lamps cleaned and filled ready for service; teamsters, who are required to feed their horses in the morning before beginning work and again in the evening after working hours; firemen, who start boilers in the morning before regular hours and clean boilers or remove ashes after regular hours, and others. The proposed amendment, while preserving the general intent of the bill, will avoid complications in the employment of these classes of persons.

d. At the end of section 1, page 2, add the following: "Provided, That nothing in this act shall apply or be construed to apply to persons performing directory, supervisory, technical, clerical, or subclerical duties, nor to masters, pilots, mates, or other persons duly articled as seamen, whose service is governed by the general navigation laws."

NOTE.—This amendment is suggested to take out of the operation of the act positions of the class which the proponents and advocates of the bill apparently had no intention of covering; also the masters and crews (other than the dredge workers) of vessels regularly in commission when governed by the general navigation laws. A bill (H. R. 23673) amending the general laws for the regulation of the employment of seamen is now before the House; and the provisions of H. R. 18787, which would apply the eight-hour law with the nine consecutive hour limit to seamen engaged in river and harbor work, are in conflict with those of H. R. 23673 governing seamen in general. Should H. R. 18787 be passed without amendment, it would put seamen who may be employed in connection with rivers and harbor work on a different basis from other seamen and would prevent the use of the ordinary watch-and-watch system which is universally recognized and which is provided for in H. R. 23673, and would require seamen on river and harbor work to work eight hours consecutively instead of four hours on and four hours off, as contemplated by the general navigation laws. It is believed that all persons covered by this proposed amendment render services of a character which should reasonably be excepted from the rigid requirements of the bill as drawn, especially from the limitation of service to nine consecutive hours; for example, men in supervisory positions, who do no manual labor, but who may have office work to do or reports to make after hours; clerks, whose employment is governed by other law (R. S., 1764–1765); masters, pilots, and mates who are necessarily responsible and subject to call at all hours, especially on continuous voyages between ports, and one of whom must be responsible for the boat during the entire trip, irrespective of hours.

W. H. BIXBY,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to add that it seems to me that if this bill passes the House in its present shape it is going to work a great hardship on the Government. It will not only cost the Government a great deal more, in my opinion, and in the opinion of the engineers, but it is going to embarrass them very materially in carrying on certain classes of river and harbor work. The amendment which the gentleman says he is willing to accept will not meet the entire situation. It would meet a part of it, to be sure, but not all. I had hoped that he would accept not only that amendment, but others of a similar nature suggested by the Chief of Engineers, and a copy of which I furnished to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] this morning.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman that I have no objection, so far as I am concerned, to amendment "A" in that document furnished by the War Department, or amendment "B"; and certain amendments to amendment "D" I would be perfectly willing to agree to; but to amendment "C," which is the one the gentleman just suggested, I am opposed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move that the time of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Florida be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I would then offer as an amendment, in line 10, page 2, changing "and" to "or."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] that there is an amendment pending, and when that amendment is disposed of his amendment will be entertained.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SABATH. Did I understand him correctly to state a few moments ago that the Engineer Department was opposed to the eight-hour work?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Not in any sense of the word. As I understand it, they are in favor of all reasonable application of the eight-hour principle. But they are of the impression, in fact they are pretty firmly convinced, that this bill, as we are proposing to pass it here, would work a great hardship on the Government in certain kinds of river and harbor work.

Mr. SABATH. How many hours do the engineers work a day?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I can not say as to that, but I think Gen. Bixby and some of the other gentlemen there work 16 hours a day. I fancy I am safe in saying they work more than 8 hours.

Mr. SABATH. Gen. Bixby and the rest of them?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, the clerks there, perhaps, do not.

Mr. SABATH. Then I would say they are overworked and need some relief.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am inclined to believe that. And I have no doubt the gentleman himself is overworked. He works more than eight hours a day. But that is neither here nor there.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this class of legislation. I have no objection to an eight-hour workday. I think the principle is sound economically and is beneficial to all. I believe that wherever it can be applied to workmen it ought to be applied, and in most cases of continuous work it can easily be applied; but in certain classes of river and harbor work it is not easy of application and would work a hardship on some. In many cases the employee works intermittently a few minutes and then stops for perhaps an hour or two. So that it would be difficult to apply the eight-hour principle or this nine-hour provision to them without entailing a hardship upon the Government or its contractor, which is the same thing.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I do not exactly understand the amendment that he suggested that he would not object to. I do not have it before me, and I want to ask the gentleman this question: On the Mississippi River they have what are called "range lights" in the river. There is a man employed by the Government to see that these lights are lighted at night and put out in the morning. Now, more than nine hours will elapse between the time the man goes to put them out in the morning and the time when he goes back to light them again in the evening, but it will take perhaps only an hour or two in the morning and perhaps only an hour or two in the evening. Now, the gentleman, I understand, is willing to accept the amendment as offered. I want to ask the gentleman whether under that amendment that class of contractors would be excepted from this nine-hour limitation.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. If they come within the construction of "laborers and mechanics," they would not be exempted, and they would still be included.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman understands that a man takes a contract, as I understand it, to keep these lights burning, and he is paid so much, a very small compensation—as I recall, $10 a month. But he takes a contract with the Government, and it is in relation to the improvement of the navigation of our rivers.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That part is stricken out in the amendment, and it is only work in relation to dredging, snagging, or rock excavation that would be included in the amendment. The other works in connection with rivers and harbors would be excluded, and the maintenance would be excluded from the operation of it. Nothing would be included except the dredging and snagging and excavation, as the intent and purpose of the authors of the bill and the committee was to apply the eight-hour workday to the dredgemen, because the Supreme Court had held that they were not laborers or mechanics, but were seamen, and consequently the general eight-hour law did not apply to them. Personally I have no objection to the bill being amended so that it applies to the dredging work alone.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Under the amendment, as I understand the gentleman, this lamplighter would not, in his opinion, be limited by this nine-hour provsion? The same man could go in the morning and put the lamp out and return in the afternoon to light it, more than nine hours apart?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That would not, in my judgment, be considered as work in connection with snagging and dredging and rock excavation; and it not being either of these three, it would not change existing law as applying to them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, may we have that amendment reported?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has already been reported, but the Clerk will again report it.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, after the word "emergency," in line 24, page 2, the following proviso: "Provided, That the construction or repair of levees or revetments necessary for protection against floods or overflows on the navigable waters of the United States shall be considered to be extraordinary emergency work within the meaning of this act."

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, in the river and harbor bill which has recently become a law this provision was carried, because the House believed that that character of work was extraordinary emergency work. In the eight-hour law which was passed by the House a few weeks ago, known as the Hughes bill, there was also a provision, incorporated in the Senate and agreed to by the House, which excepted from the eight-hour limitation work done on levees and revetments to prevent floods on the navigable streams of the country.

Contractors who are engaged in this work believed that that was emergency work, because there are only a few months in the year in which such work can be done on the levees to protect the country from overflow, and they proceeded upon the theory that that was always emergency work. But the Supreme Court, last fall, in construing that statute, said that as it was a continuing emergency, an emergency that was always present, as the work of levee building was continuous, in the opinion of the court Congress did not intend to except it by the use of the words "extraordinary emergency," and it therefore declared that all levee work came within the limitations of the eight-hour law.

As a matter of fact, whatever it may be as a matter of law, the building of levees to protect the country from floods is an extraordinary emergency, because there are only a few months in the year when this work can be done. We have all seen in the past few months what calamitous results may follow if the work is not prosecuted, and prosecuted vigorously, in the months in which it can be done.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. BOWMAN. If the work described by the gentleman is continuous, why is it not possible to have three shifts of eight hours each?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It is. It is possible to have three shifts of eight hours always on all work. There never was any extraordinary emergency where it was not possible to have three shifts of eight hours each. The question is not whether it is possible or not. The question is whether it is desirable to require it.

Gentlemen will understand that this work is in no way performed by skilled labor. It is performed, as a rule, by the farmers in the neighborhood. It simply consists in hauling dirt and dumping it onto the levees. Unless it can be done in the months when there is no high water and before the rainy season sets in it can not be done in time. This year the conditions proved to be calamitous to such an extent that at one time the Secretary of War reported that he was feeding and housing 160,000 people who had been rendered homeless by the breaks in the levees.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think the words "except in case of extraordinary emergency" cover the very point he makes? I think the bill covers his point.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. HUMPHREYS] have five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It seems to me that the gentleman's amendment is already covered by the bill. The gentleman cites the particular instance of the levees of the Mississippi River. There might be emergencies in other places, so that the specification of the Mississippi River in the bill might work a hardship in other extraordinary emergencies.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The amendment does not specify the Mississippi River. It refers to all rivers, and it is the exact language which the House incorporated into the recent eight-hour law, and it is the language which we put into the river and harbor bill, because we believed as a matter of fact that this is extraordinary emergency work, although the court, very properly, perhaps, decided under the language of the law that it is not extraordinary emergency work.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield for one other question?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. BOWMAN. The present speaker has had some experience in the sort of work the gentleman speaks of, and it is very exhausting. I do not think any man ought to be kept at that kind of work more than eight hours.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman understands that you can not require anybody to work on that kind of work more than eight hours unless he wants to do it; but the little farmers around there, when they lay by their crops, are all very anxious to get at this work, and they start out in the morning early; and if they can work only eight hours they have to cease work long before sundown, knowing that the two or three hours during which they must remain idle may mean that the floods will come down the river and break the levees and destroy their property.

As to the three shifts of men, of course you can not build levees at night. It would be out of the question to undertake to light up that whole levee line so that they could work at night. They simply work in the daytime.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Right there on that point, does not the gentleman think the last two lines on page 2 of this bill cover the very proposition which the gentleman speaks of?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Except in extraordinary emergencies.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I thought so, and we undertook in that way to allow more than eight hours' work. The parties were indicted and the case finally got to the Supreme Court of the United States, and they held that the building of levees to prevent floods along the Mississippi River was not extraordinary emergency work. Whatever the facts are, the court has held that to be the law. I hope there will be no objection to this amendment. We put it in the river and harbor bill, we put it in the other eight-hour law, and certainly nothing has arisen since then to make it less desirable now than it has been in the past, when it was placed on these other two bills. I hope therefore that the House will agree to put it in this bill, just as they wrote it into both of the others.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this amendment, for the reason that the bill now provides for the exception of extraordinary emergency work. The statement of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] leads me to believe that the amendment put in the river and harbor bill was not for an emergency. Where there was a real emergency, and it was necessary to work 10 or 12 hours a day in order to save life and property, that probably could be done; but from the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] it appears that this work is only made emergency work owing to the fact that that amendment went into the bill. It seems to me this provision in the present bill is ample to protect extraordinary emergency work—that is, work which needs to be expedited in order to save life and property. As I understand it, ordinary levee work is not extraordinary emergency work. It is not necessary to work more than one shift, and therefore, in my judgment, the eight-hour law ought to apply to it. If we are going to make this an exception, we probably will have a demand in the near future for another eight-hour bill. By all means let us try to get this bill so that it will apply to Government work and cover all that is intended to be covered by Congress, and not let amendments be inserted here which, in my judgment, would annul the law so far as levee work is concerned. In a case where it is necessary to protect life and property, where there is a great flood threatened, or where, as recently occurred, the levees are destroyed and the water is overflowing the country, destroying property and creating a condition that is unhealthful and will result in preventing farmers from raising crops, that is an emergency. That is why I made no objection in regard to the present levee work, caused, as I understand it, by the washing out of the levees, which makes it necessary to strengthen them and make them higher. Where it is necessary to make the levees higher it does not seem to me to be extraordinary emergency work, and if it is this bill is sufficient, where it says that extraordinary emergency work shall be excepted.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield until I can ask a question of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman can get time in his own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago we passed a law limiting the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon work done for the United States, and so forth, and provided that in every contract made hereafter in which the United States, and so forth, was a party, a provision for an eight-hour limitation should be incorporated. In that law we made the exception that it should not apply to contracts for the construction or repair of levees or revetments necessary for protection against floods or overflows on the navigable waters of the United States.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That was a Senate amendment, was it not?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes; to which the House unanimously agreed. If the United States can contract for this kind of work without incorporating in the contract this eight-hour limitation, why should the eight-hour limitation then be applied to the man who makes the contract with the Government? It occurs to me that if it was good policy then—and that was only on the 19th of June last that the bill was approved—to incorporate that provision in the bill, it certainly ought not to be objectionable now.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman that that was accepted, I believe, by those who were interested in the bill because they feared further delay and possible defeat of the bill. It was acquiesced in because of the fact they thought if they made an effort to secure the approval of the Senate to the bill as they wanted it it would probably result in delay and possibly in defeating it. So far as this eight-hour law is concerned, I want to say that it has been demonstrated time and again that more work can be obtained in that way than with a longer day. Much has been said here about the farmer. I honestly believe, from the information I have from the votes on this question, that if it were left to the farmers they would vote for an eight-hour law. In Colorado and New York, where this question of eight hour or shorter workday has been voted on by the people, so that the State constitution might be revised to permit the enactment of an eight-hour law, the vote has been in favor of the eight-hour law almost three to one, and I have no knowledge of any vote that has ever been taken on that question, when it has been put clearly to the people, that has not been carried by a large majority.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I am not aware, of course, of that situation, and the gentleman is, as to the modus operandi by which this amendment was agreed to on the other eight-hour bill. The gentleman states that it was put on there in order to prevent objection and further delay to the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will say the same thing was done in regard to the date it was to take effect—the 1st of January. Those who were interested in it wanted it to take effect at an earlier date than that, but rather than take any chances they accepted the Senate amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman think it entirely fair if that is true, if the other eight-hour bill was passed through the House by agreeing to exempt this particular work from the eight-hour limitation that we should now put it in another bill and apply it?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I say that I think it is fair to try and get an effective eight-hour law which Congress formerly intended and which the people want and this House favors.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have just looked at the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi and I feel that it is an amendment that ought to be opposed and defeated. It would defeat to a large extent the very purpose for which this bill is intended. We adopted an eight-hour law for certain Government employees, in the Post Office, on public works, and elsewhere, and now propose to extend that law to those who work on dredges, who by reason of a Supreme Court decision have been held not correctly designated as laborers. This bill proposes to cover that provision of the Supreme Court decision. If this amendment be adopted, it means that we take out of the category of laborers entitled to an eight-hour day the men who must necessarily be employed on permanent works protecting the banks of rivers against floods. It refers not only to the men who will work by the hundreds and thousands building up the levees and revetments along the Mississippi in times of flood and distress but those who work on every other river throughout the country, which rivers by reason of legislation and the ordinary processes of the engineers' office, will be protected against flood when there is no flood. If the amendment meant that we were to except those laborers who were called suddenly while the waters were flowing in, threatening to destroy human life and property, the situation would be different. It applies to any permanent work begun this year or any other time by way of precaution against floods that may happen next year or a hundred years hence. It is not an emergency amendment, and, if adopted, will release from the provisions of the eight-hour law thousands of men who will be engaged upon permanent work not only on the Mississippi but on all the other rivers of the country.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to see the House take a backward step on the eight-hour proposition. I appreciate the difficulty which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] has stated to the House in reference to levee work, and yet the existing law applies to laborers in that class of work. To now provide that that class of labor should be excepted from the law, it seems to me, would be taking a backward step. The law now applies to laborers on river and harbor work. The purpose of this bill is to make it apply to these men who are called by the Supreme Court, and I have no doubt that that is correct, seamen; but to say that it shall not apply to laborers in the future is to say that Congress is endeavoring to repeal that provision of the law that has been on the statute books for many years.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The law that passed in June excepts this work.

Mr. MANN. The law that we passed in June excepts this work, but that law specifically provides, if I remember correctly, that it shall not take out from under the eight-hour law anyone who is included under the eight-hour law under this original act. It does not repeal any provision of the original act.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. But it provides that such contracts need not embrace this eight-hour limitation.

Mr. MANN. Under that law; but the original eight-hour law passed in 1891 or 1892, I believe, expressly applies to contracts with laborers, employees either by the Government or by contractors, and puts that labor on the eight-hour basis, and it has been on an eight-hour basis all that time. Now, as to emergency work like happened this spring. The eight-hour law does not apply to that case. That is a case of extraordinary emergency.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. We have proceeded ever since 1892 and have always proceeded upon the theory that levee building was an extraordinary emergency work, and we proceeded upon that theory until the past year, when the Supreme Court decided otherwise. Thereupon the very first opportunity which arose where the matter was pertinent this Congress excepted levee work in the river and harbor bill, and then in the first eight-hour law afterwards we excepted it, and it occurs to me, having ascertained that this is not emergency work, which we have heretofore thought it was, it would be no step backward now to declare the law to be what we thought it was all the while.

Mr. MANN. I will say there was no vote in the House on that proposition as an amendment of the eight-hour law recently passed here or as an amendment to the river and harbor bill.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Both items were inserted in the Senate or in conference, and the House never had a chance at all.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The matter was called to the attention of the House by the gentleman from Illinois himself.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but I was not willing to vote against the conference report on the river and harbor bill, knowing probably we would have a chance to take care of it on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, if there has been an exception in connection with construction work on levees and revetment not occurring while the water is forcing its way through them, it is time it was changed in the interest of humanity. The report on this bill states very distinctly:

> At the present stage of the discussion of reducing the hours of the workday it is no longer necessary to set out to prove the benefits to mankind gained everywhere in industrial life through cutting off all the hours of employment above eight.

That character of employment is very exhausting work, and I do not think there should be any exception made in this case. A vote should be had in this House to decide whether or not such an exception should be made.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that all debate on this section close in five minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SHACKLEFORD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

S. 7209. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at the town site of Sartell, Minn.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 7209. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at the town site of Sartell, Minn.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

LIMITATION OF HOURS OF EMPLOYEES ON PUBLIC WORKS.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPARKMAN. If the gentleman in charge of the bill is willing to accept some amendments which——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman rise to offer an amendment?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am going to offer the following amendment: In line 10, page 2, change the word "and" to "or."

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Florida send his amendment to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have not the amendment written.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Perhaps I can help the gentleman from Florida, if his amendment is to line 9, page 2. If the gentleman will permit me, I will offer this amendment which I think is what he wants.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 8, amend, by striking out the words "in constructing, maintaining, or improving a" and substitute the following: "to perform services similar to those of laborers and mechanics in connection with dredging (snagging or rock excavation) in any."

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I would ask the gentleman from Florida to strike out the parentheses. It seems to me the parentheses ought to be stricken out.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think that is very proper.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. With that change, I have no objection to it.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman quite sure that will accomplish what the Supreme Court has decided to be seamen on barges? As I understand the gentleman's amendment, it provides that all persons engaged in work similar to that performed by laborers or mechanics in dredging, snagging, and so forth. The Supreme Court has held, I think properly, that men operating upon a dredge on the water are not laborers and are not mechanics, but are under the designation of seamen. The statutes and elsewhere say they are seamen.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me to read two sentences which will answer his question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The object of the bill is to bring within the protection of the eight-hour law the dredge workers who by the decision of the Supreme Court on May 13, 1907, were declared not to be "laborers or mechanics employed on any of the public works of the United States" within the meaning of the act of August 1, 1892. The amendment suggested will cover these men without going so far as to embrace a large variety of other employees, the conditions of whose employment are such that they do not need the protection of the proposed law.

Mr. MANN. Whose decision is this?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, I have always believed, Mr. Chairman, that the Engineers of the United States Army are very careful students of the law and make very few moves without they are thoroughly advised. It happens that this is an expression from the Chief of the United States Army Engineers.

Mr. MANN. I have very great respect for his learning as an engineer and his learning as a lawyer, yet I am not entirely clear that the expression "persons performing work similar to laborers" would include seamen.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. In my judgment, it would not include a seaman in the ordinary sense of the term "seaman," but it would include that class of workmen in dredging work in our rivers and harbors who had prior to that time been considered as laborers and mechanics, but which under the decision of the Supreme Court were decided to be seamen, such as the firemen and the engineers and the laborers in connection with the dredging operations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I thought I had the floor, but I yield it. The Chair had started to put the question on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs the gentleman's pardon. The gentleman from Illinois did have the floor.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that I do not think those words embrace seamen in any sense. I think the language is drawn for the purpose of including seamen. There is a large class of employees who work on dredges that are not seamen in any sense.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And are not seamen in any sense.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, the trouble we encounter and the necessity for this bill is that the Supreme Court has rendered a decision that they are seamen. If they are, I think there are some grounds for doubting whether this is a wise amendment to which to agree. Any way, it makes it uncertain to me whether or not it will cover the grounds we wish it to cover, taking into consideration the decision as rendered by the Supreme Court. Is not the purpose of this to exclude cooks, waiters, watchmen, and so forth?

Mr. SPARKMAN. All such employees as those; yes. Those who work on dredges, for instance, and in similar work.

Mr. BUCHANAN. And lock tenders? Why could we not have an amendment excluding cooks, waiters, lock tenders, and so forth?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I took this amendment as it was given me by the engineers and submitted it to the gentleman this morning. I did not know he had any serious objection to it at that time. If he had I would have tried to have it conform to his views.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am in harmony with the purposes of this amendment. As I stated the other day, it seems to me it is difficult, due to the rulings of the department officials and judges, to know just what we can put in to make it a workable law. It would be construed the other way sufficiently, I suppose, to let them "lubricate" it, but when it comes to getting benefit for the workmen, and reduce hours, and better conditions it is mighty hard to get the law applied as it was intended by the creators of the law.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. May I ask the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Florida yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. In the work on the Mississippi River particularly—and I suppose it is true on a great many other public works—they use a great many teams. The contractor hires men to take care of them—to feed them early in the morning, for instance. Under your amendment, if it is agreed to, will it be unlawful for a man to feed the teams in the morning and feed them again at night, or does your amendment except them from this nine hours limitation?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am not sure that it would go as far as that. Perhaps it ought to, but the amendment that would have covered that feature is one that the gentlemen in charge of the bill will not accept. They are willing, as I understand, to accept this particular amendment, which very likely does not go to the extent the gentleman suggests.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The amendment that is now pending does not include teamsters?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It does not refer to teamsters.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Is it the purpose of the gentleman when this is disposed of to offer an amendment to the bill which does make it possible for the contractor to employ a man lawfully to feed the teams in the morning and also to feed them at night?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The provision that I offered awhile ago embraced that class of employees. But I do not propose to offer any amendments here which those in charge of the bill will not accept.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman, I understood, did not offer it, but had some discussion with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] on the subject. Is it not his intention to offer such an amendment?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not wish to offer an amendment which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] will not accept, and I understand he does not feel inclined to accept an amendment such as that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to say if the gentleman from Florida does not offer the amendment, I will.

Mr. MANN. That was an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It does not meet the emergency raised by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Just a moment. I want to protect that by another amendment. In line 10, page 2, change the word "and" to the word "or."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 10, by striking out the word "and" and inserting the word "or."

Mr. MANN. What is the purpose of that amendment?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The intention is to make it agree to the amendment just adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 13, by inserting after the word "workday" the following: "Except in the case of service which is by its nature noncontinuous or which requires only a portion of the employee's time, and which is required only for brief periods at intervals."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] object to the adoption of this amendment?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I certainly do. It would destroy the entire purpose of the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, in support of the amendment, I will simply read the reasons that are given by the department for the amendment to the bill. I am heartily in favor of the passage of this bill. It is a good measure and yet there are some features that might be advantageously added. Therefore I submit these suggestions to my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] and to the House. I read:

In the ordinary case of regular, continuous, manual labor which this bill is designed to cover the time and attention of the employee must be given to the work from the time he begins work in the morning until he quits at night, except for the noon stop for dinner. There are, however, many cases among "all persons employed in constructing, maintaining, or improving a river or harbor" in which the work is necessarily intermittent, and the employee has time during the day that is at his own disposal for his own private affairs, or in which incidental service of minor character must be rendered before or after hours. Among employees of this character are cooks, cooks' helpers, waiters, servants, messengers, day and night watchmen, lock masters, and lock employees; light keepers on the western rivers, whose duty it is to light the lights at nightfall and extinguish them in the morning and keep the lamps cleaned and filled ready for service; teamsters, who are required to feed their horses in the morning before beginning work and again in the evening after working hours; firemen, who start boilers in the morning before regular hours and clean boilers or remove ashes after regular hours; and others. The proposed amendment, while preserving the general intent of the bill, will avoid complications in the employment of these classes of persons.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these are the reasons assigned by officers of the Government who have charge of these public works, and it does seem to me that in the instances given perhaps there ought to be some latitude; where, for instance, a man is employed to come in and light the fires in the boilers in the morning, and goes away and then comes back and banks them at night; or, in the case referred to by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], where a man is employed to feed the horses one hour, and then goes away and comes back later and feeds them again. It seems to me these are cases where there might fairly be an exception and where the department ought to have some discretion, especially since a penalty is imposed upon the employing officer—a penalty which involves fine and imprisonment.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the difficulty with the amendment submitted by the gentleman is that it covers a great deal more than is cited in the letter that he has just quoted from. It not only covers men who have to start the fires in the morning in the boiler room, before the day's work in general begins, and to the stablemen and hostlers and to the lock tenders who are employed only a part of the time, but it also includes all of the men employed on the dredges; and I want to quote from the same letter that the gentleman quoted from in order to show that the officers in charge realize that fact. In that letter this statement is made:

This matter was only examined into in connection with dredging operations on the Great Lakes last year, and the reports from all the officers in charge of such work were unanimously to the effect that under the present conditions of operation no man on either the dredges or the tugs does regularly more than eight hours' actual work in the course of a working day, and that from two to three hours or more of the period between the time he is called to work in the morning and the time he quits work at night are lost through the causes mentioned.

So that, if the exception that the gentleman proposes is included in the bill, it will not only take with it the hostlers and stablemen and lock tenders, but it will also take with it the dredgemen, the very men that are sought to be reached by this bill. I hope, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield before he takes his seat?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to his colleague?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I happen to know that there is sometimes great difficulty in the matter of serving meals on dredges. How would the gentleman, as an officer, regard the duty of a man who waits on the table during the meal hours? How would you enforce the eight-hour rule?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. So far as the culinary department is concerned, I do not see why an eight-hour workday should not apply, although we have not reached that stage as yet. I do not see why it should apply to lock tenders, who have only a brief period of time each day to apply to the work. I do not see any reason why it should apply to the stablemen and men of that kind, and I have no desire to make it apply to them. But when it comes to the culinary department in every large institution engaged in dredging operations, the men employed in the culinary department are actively on duty from 14 to 16 hours a day, they being on duty before the regular day's work begins, making ready to get the meals for the men, and afterwards to clean up the kitchen and dining room after the day's operations are over. So that I see no reason why we could not apply it in a practical way to the men engaged in the culinary department, and keep two shifts, of 8 hours each, engaged for 16 hours. As to the other men that I mentioned, there is no urgent necessity for including them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But there are instances where there might be no service rendered at all, unless you took a man whose services were intermittent for an hour or two and engaged him for eight hours.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Then that would be covered by this bill. It would be an emergency.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LEWIS. Is it not a fact, sir, as developed in the hearings that took place on this bill before the committee, that almost everybody connected with the work, except the supervising foremen, worked intermittently, and that none of them work continuously? And is it not therefore a fact that the exceptions sought to be introduced would prove the rule for all these employees?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is true, Mr. Chairman, and that is what I have been trying to impress upon the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], that his amendment would not only include the men who are cited in the quotation he makes, but would include all the men engaged in dredging operations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 24, add, after the word "emergency," the following: "Provided, That nothing in this act shall apply or be construed to apply to persons performing directory, supervisory, or clerical duties, nor to masters, pilots, or mates, or other persons duly articled as seamen, whose service is governed by the general navigation laws."

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will strike out that part of his amendment beginning with the word "or" and the remainder of it, I will be perfectly willing to accept it.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. That is all. I will consent to that modification.

Mr. MANN. I should like to have the amendment reported as modified.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 24, after the word "emergency," insert the following: "Provided, That nothing in this act shall apply or be construed to apply to persons performing directory, supervisory, or clerical duties, nor to masters, pilots, or mates."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I should like to ask the gentleman from Louisiana whether he will accept the words "technical or subclerical" as an amendment to his amendment.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I have no objection to accepting those words, but the gentlemen in charge of the bill do object to them, and I think it is a pretty good amendment in its present form. Therefore I do not insist on putting in those words.

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, in line 17, after the word "or," where it occurs the second time, to insert the words "of such."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 17, page 2, by inserting, after the second word "or," the words "of such."

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will notice that the words "or persons employed in constructing" are an insert in the original law. If this bill should be enacted in its present form, without inserting those words, it would eliminate the eight-hour law from laborers or mechanics engaged in anything except river and harbor work.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Then, I move, in line 20, after the word "or," where it occurs the second time, to strike out the word "persons" and insert the words "any such person."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 20, strike out the word "persons" and insert the words "any such person."

Mr. MANN. That amendment is offered for the same reason.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

We adopted an amendment in line 9 a while ago, striking out the words "in constructing, maintaining, or improving a" and making an insert in place of it. To make that at all effective it will, of course, have to be carried through the bill.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I understood that amendments were to be offered wherever those words occur.

Mr. MANN. That is the reason I call attention to it. In line 21 the same thing comes in.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It occurs in two other places besides that, and I understood that amendments were to be offered at those points.

Mr. KENDALL. In line 18.

Mr. MANN. In line 18 and in line 21.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think an amendment of that kind is very proper.

Mr. MANN. It does not mean anything without it.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman expect to follow up his amendments at the points suggested?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; I had not intended doing so, but I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Of course, unless it is offered, the section does not mean anything after we get through with it. I do not care to offer the amendment. Let the gentleman do it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, in line 18, I move to strike out the words "in constructing, maintaining, or improving a" and insert the words "to perform services similar to those of laborers and mechanics in connection with dredging, snagging, or rock excavation in any."

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the gentleman ask unanimous consent to strike out the same words in lines 18 and 21 that were stricken out in line 9, and insert in lieu thereof the same amendment that was inserted in line 9.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that the request of the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is perfectly satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 18, by striking out the words "in constructing, maintaining, or improving a" and insert in lieu thereof the words "to perform services similar to those of laborers and mechanics in connection with dredging, snagging, or rock excavation in any."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the same amendment apply in line 21.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the same amendment apply in line 21. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

VIOLATION OF ACT BY OFFICER OR CONTRACTOR PUNISHABLE.

SEC. 2. That any officer or agent of the Government of the United States or of the District of Columbia, or any contractor or subcontractor whose duty it shall be to employ, direct, or control any laborer or mechanic employed upon a public work of the United States or of the District of Columbia, or any person employed in constructing, maintaining, or improving a river or harbor of the United States or of the District of Columbia, who shall intentionally violate any provision of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and for each and every such offense shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine not to exceed $1,000, or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court having jurisdiction thereof.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the same amendment that was agreed to, in lines 17 and 18 and line 21 on page 2, be agreed to as applying to lines 8 and 9 on page 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the amendment agreed to in lines 17 and 18 and line 21 on page 2 be agreed to as applying to lines 8 and 9 on page 3. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXISTING CONTRACTS NOT AFFECTED BY ACT.

SEC. 3. That the provisions of this act shall not be so construed as to in any manner apply to or affect contractors or subcontractors, or to limit the hours of daily service of laborers or mechanics engaged upon a public work of the United States or of the District of Columbia, or persons employed in constructing, maintaining, or improving a river or harbor of the United States or of the District of Columbia, for which contracts have been entered into prior to the passing of this act.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment which was agreed to as applying to lines 17, 18, and line 21 on page 2 be agreed to as applying to lines 23 and 24 on page 3.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAGE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 18787 and had instructed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en grosse. [After a pause.] The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LANGLEY, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. HUGHES of Georgia, for two days, on account of sickness.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 5545. An act providing for patents on reclamation entries, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, August 1, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule III,

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 70) to constitute a commission to investigate the purchase of American-grown tobacco by the governments of foreign countries, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1118), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 25987) to grant an annuity to Annie Neate, and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, memorial of the new Seattle Chamber of Commerce, of Seattle, Wash., favoring passage of House bill 357, relative to investigation of foreign and domestic fire insurance companies; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado: Memorial of the Ladies' Auxiliary of the International Association of Machinists, of Denver, Colo., against the treatment of the textile workers in the strike at Lawrence, Mass.; to the Committee on Labor.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, August 1, 1912.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

Mr. BACON took the chair as President pro tempore under the order of the Senate of July 29, 1912.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ESTIMATE OF APPROPRIATION (S. DOC. NO. 889).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. BACON) laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of deficiency in the appropriation for "Miscellaneous expenses, Supreme Court, District of Columbia," for the fiscal year 1912, amounting to $8,349.95, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had adopted a replication to the answer of Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States for the third judicial circuit and designated a judge of the United States Commerce Court, to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him, and that the same will be presented to the Senate by the managers on the part of the House; and also that the managers have authority to file with the Secretary of the Senate, on the part of the House of Representatives, any subsequent pleadings which they shall deem necessary.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 18787) relating to the limitation of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon a public work of the United States and of the District of Columbia, and of all persons employed in constructing, maintaining, or improving a river or harbor of the United States and of the District of Columbia, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 22195) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 21213) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. HARRISON of New York, Mr. KITCHIN, Mr. PAYNE, and Mr. MCCALL managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 21214) to extend the special excise tax now levied with respect to doing business by corporations to persons, and to provide revenue for the Government by levying a special excise tax with respect to doing business by individuals and copartnerships, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. HULL, Mr. PALMER, Mr. PAYNE, and Mr. MCCALL managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 5545) providing for the issuing of patent to entrymen for homestead upon reclamation projects, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

CALLING OF THE ROLL—RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina suggests the absence of a quorum, and——

Mr. PAGE. I hope the Senator will withdraw that suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule is imperative. The suggestion can not be withdrawn.

Mr. SIMMONS. I can not withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Smith, S. C.
Bacon	du Pont	Myers	Swanson
Bailey	Fletcher	Overman	Thornton
Borah	Hitchcock	Page	Tillman
Bourne	Johnson, Me.	Percy	Warren
Bradley	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Watson
Bristow	Jones	Pomerene	Wetmore
Bryan	Kenyon	Reed	Williams
Chamberlain	Kern	Simmons
Clapp	La Follette	Smith, Ariz.
Crawford	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.

Mr. WATSON. I announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. CHILTON], on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. THORNTON. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. FOSTER]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the call of the roll of the Senate 41 Senators have responded to their names. A quorum of the Senate is not now present.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I do not think the names of the absentees should be called right now. I think we ought to take a recess. I move that the Senate take a recess for half an hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina moves that the Senate be in recess until a quarter to 1 o'clock. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 12 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 12 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m., when it reassembled.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll of the Senate, the previous roll call having disclosed the absence of a quorum.

Mr. OVERMAN. The roll having been called, would it not be better to have the names of the absentees called?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll. That will be the better course.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Fletcher	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Bourne	Gallinger	Page	Smoot
Bradley	Gronna	Penrose	Sutherland
Brandegee	Johnson, Me.	Percy	Swanson
Bristow	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Thornton
Bryan	Jones	Poindexter	Tillman
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Pomerene	Townsend
Clapp	La Follette	Root	Warren
Crane	Lodge	Sanders	Watson
Crawford	McLean	Shively	Wetmore
Cullom	Martine, N. J.	Simmons	Williams
Cummins	Massey	Smith, Ariz.	Works
Dillingham	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Fall	Nelson	Smith, Mich.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

In order that the record may be complete and understood in the future, the Chair desires to state when the call of the roll disclosed that a quorum was not present the Chair entertained the motion to take a recess. The rule provides that no motion, except a motion to adjourn or to compel the attendance of Senators, shall be entertained when no quorum is present. The Chair simply desires to state that the circumstances to-day were recognized by all as exceptional, and, as no Senator made a point of order, the Chair did not feel called upon to enforce it in that instance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 21888) providing for the sale of the United States unused post-office site at Perth Amboy, N. J., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 997) thereon.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 5775) for the relief of William S. McCollam, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 998) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 1384) for the relief of William Mickler, submitted an adverse report (No. 999) thereon, which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 7377. A bill granting a right of way through the Fort Shafter Military Reservation, Territory of Hawaii, to the Pearl Harbor Traction Co. (Ltd.), and for other purposes (Rept. No. 1000); and

S. 6655. A bill for the relief of Lester A. Rockwell (Rept. No. 1001).

Mr. CRAWFORD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 23451) to pay certain employees of the Government for injuries received while in the discharge of their duties and other claims for damages to and loss of private property, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1002) thereon.

Mr. ROOT. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the bill (S. 4256) to approve the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the treaty of Ghent, to report it favorably, with an amendment, and I submit a report (No. 1005) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask permission to file the views of the minority (Rept. No. 1005, pt. 2) to be printed with the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered without objection.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (S. 3757) for the relief of the Eldredge Bros. Live Stock Co., a corporation, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1003) thereon.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 7318) to accept the cession by the State of Montana of exclusive jurisdiction over the lands embraced within the Glacier National Park, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1004) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. PERKINS:

A bill (S. 7405) for the relief of persons suffering damages by reason of the construction of the canal diverting the waters of the Mormon Slough into the Calaveras River (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 7406) to provide for the erection of a public building at Cedar City, Utah; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. SMITH of Georgia:

A bill (S. 7407) increasing the limit of cost of the post-office building at Atlanta, Ga. (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 7408) granting an increase of pension to Helena E. Clark (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $500 to pay Clinton R. Thompson for extra clerical services in connection with the work of the Committee on the District of Columbia, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 25970), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

HOUR OF DAILY MEETING.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I offer an order for which I ask present consideration. I will say that upon free consultation with Senators on both sides of the Chamber there seems to be no objection to it.

The order was read and agreed to as follows:

Ordered, That the daily meetings of the Senate shall be at 11 o'clock a. m. until otherwise ordered.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 18787. An act relating to the limitation of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon a public work of the United States and of the District of Columbia and of all persons employed in constructing, maintaining, or improving a river or harbor of the United States and of the District of Columbia was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

FOREIGN OCCUPATIONS ON AMERICAN CONTINENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (No. 371) reported by Mr. LODGE from the Committee on Foreign Relations July 31, 1912, as follows:

Resolved, That when any harbor or other place in the American continents is so situated that the occupation thereof for naval or military purposes might threaten the communications or the safety of the United States, the Government of the United States could not see without grave concern the possession of such harbor or other place by any corporation or association which has such a relation to another Government, not American, as to give that Government practical power of control for national purposes.

IMPEACHMENT OF ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACON). The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, to which the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment adjourned, the Senate is now in session for the trial of the articles of impeachment presented by the House of Representatives against Robert W. Archbald.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives were announced and were conducted by the Assistant Doorkeeper to the seats assigned to them in the area in front of the Secretary's desk.

The respondent, Judge Robert W. Archbald, accompanied by his counsel, Mr. A. S. Worthington and Mr. Robert W. Archbald, jr., entered the Chamber and took the seats provided for them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will make proclamation.

The Sergeant at Arms made the usual proclamation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Journal of the Senate, sitting in the impeachment trial of date Monday, July 29, will now be read. Before the Secretary proceeds with the reading, the Chair will state that almost the entire part of the Journal is made up of the answer to the articles of impeachment, which has already been read in the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the answer to the articles of impeachment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the reading of the answer to the articles of impeachment be dispensed with. Unless objection is made, it will be so ordered by unanimous consent. The Secretary will proceed to read the Journal.

The Journal of the proceedings of the Senate, sitting on the trial of the impeachment Monday, July 29, 1912, was read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there objections to the Journal? If not, it will be considered as confirmed.

If there are any Senators present who have not been heretofore sworn, they will now present themselves at the desk for that purpose. [After a pause.] The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 31, 1912.

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate by the Clerk of the House informing the Senate that the House of Representatives has adopted a replication to the answer of Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States for the third judicial circuit and designated a judge of the United States Commerce Court, to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him, and that the same will be presented to the Senate by the managers on the part of the House; and also that the managers have authority to file with the Secretary of the Senate, on the part of the House of Representatives, any subsequent pleadings which they shall deem necessary.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, on behalf of the House of Representatives and on behalf of the managers of the House of Representatives I now present the replication of the House of Representatives to the answers made by Robert W. Archbald, United States circuit judge for the third judicial circuit and designated a judge of the United States Commerce Court. The replication is to the answer of the respondent. I ask that it be read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The replication of the House of Representatives will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

"Replication of the House of Representatives of the United States of America to the answer of Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States from the third judicial circuit and designated a judge of the United States Commerce Court, to the articles of impeachmcnt exhibited against him by the House of Representatives of the United States of America.

"The House of Representatives of the United States of America, having considered the several answers of Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States from the third judicial circuit and designated a judge of the United States Commerce Court, to the several articles of impeachment against him by them exhibited in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, and reserving to themselves all advantages of exception to the insufficiency, irrelevancy, and impertinency of his answer to each and all of the several articles of impeachment so exhibited against the said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, do say:

"(1) That the said articles do severally set forth impeachable offenses, high crimes, and misdemeanors as defined in the Constitution of the United States, and that the same are proper to be answered unto by the said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, and sufficient to be entertained and adjudicated by the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment.

"(2) That the said House of Representatives of the United States of America do deny each and every averment in said several answers, or either of them, which denies or traverses the acts, intents, crimes, or misdemeanors charged against the said Robert W. Archbald in said articles of impeachment, or either of them, and for replication to said answers do say that said Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States from the third judicial circuit and designated a judge of the United States Commerce Court, is guilty of the misbehaviors, high crimes, and misdemeanors charged in said articles, and that the House of Representatives are ready to prove the same."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The replication will be printed.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, by agreement of my associates, I present at this time the following order and ask for the adoption of the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That lists of witnesses be furnished the Sergeant at Arms by the managers and the respondent, who shall be subpœnaed by him to appear at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes post meridian on the 7th day of August, 1912.

Ordered, That the cause shall be opened and the trial proceeded with at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes post meridian on the 7th day of August, 1912.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. President, as far as I know, it is unprecedented to ask the court to fix a time for the trial of a case until it is at issue. By an order which has heretofore been made by the Senate it is provided that after this replication shall have been filed further pleadings on either side may be filed with the Secretary of the Senate, the pleadings to be closed by next Saturday. Having heard the replication read, I am quite clear that it will be necessary to file a further pleading on behalf of the respondent in order to have this case in such shape that it can be legally determined. So far as we are concerned, I think that further pleading may in all probability be filed certainly by 12 o'clock to-morrow.

I would respectfully suggest that it is not in order to fix a time for the trial until what is to be tried is fixed by the pleadings in the case. Under the order of the court the court will convene again on Saturday, by which time the pleadings can be closed; and I submit that that will be the time to bring up this question of the date of the trial. If the Senate shall agree with us on that matter, of course it is not necessary now to discuss the date of the trial. After that preliminary question is disposed of, if the matter is to be determined to-day, we should like to be heard at some length.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, in reply to the counsel for the respondent, I have to say that the proposition submitted on the part of the managers is not without precedent. I find, sir, that in Senate Document No. 144, in the Fifty-eighth Congress, third session, Judge Charles Swayne filed his acceptance or acknowledgment of the service and the statement that he had employed Mr. Higgins and Mr. Thurston as his counsel, and asking in substance that they be so recognized by the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment; and on that same day Messrs. Higgins and Thurston, the counsel, moved the court to grant the respondent a period of seven days in which to prepare and present his answer to the articles of impeachment presented against him. That was before the answer was made, of course. Then I find that on the same day, following that motion made by the counsel for the respondent, this order was made:

Ordered, That the respondent present his answer to the articles of impeachment at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes post meridian on the 3d day of February next.

I quote from the record:

Mr. Manager PALMER. I move the adoption of the order which I send to the Secretary's desk to be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed order will be read.

The order to which I have just referred, Mr. President, which is "that the respondent present his answer to the articles of impeachment at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes post meridian on the 3d day of February next," was agreed to, as the record shows. Then Mr. Manager Palmer said:

I move the adoption of the order which I send to the Secretary's desk to be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed order will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That lists of witnesses be furnished the Sergeant at Arms by the managers and the respondent, who shall be subpœnaed by him to appear on the 10th day of February, at 1 o'clock post meridian.

Ordered, That the cause shall be opened and the trial proceed on the 13th day of February, at 1 o'clock post meridian, unless otherwise ordered.

An examination of the record, Mr. President, will reveal the fact that the order was entered requiring the witnesses to be subpœnaed to appear on the 10th day of February. The record will also further disclose the fact that on this same day, to wit, January 27, and before the respondent had even so much as filed his answer, the trial was set down for the 13th day of February. The proposed order is not without precedent, and I think there are other precedents of cases which have heretofore been tried in the Senate sitting as a high court of impeachment.

But, Mr. President, aside from the mere matter of precedent, we are all mindful of the conditions that now confront the Senate and the Congress. We know the lateness of the session. We know that this case has been well considered by a committee of the coordinate branch of the Congress, and by that other branch, the House itself. We know that the House of Representatives has presented articles at length; we know that the answer has been made at length, and we know that the replication has been filed. It appears to the managers that there is no necessity for leaving the question open any longer as to when this case shall be tried. We are all anxious to have that question settled to-day.

On behalf of the House of Representatives and on behalf of the managers I am directed to say that it is the wish of the House of Representatives and the managers that this trial be had at this time. The managers are of opinion that they can have this case ready to be proceeded with on the 7th instant, the day designated in the order, and it does seem to the managers that the respondent's counsel should give some better reason than that which he has assigned for asking a postponement of the consideration of the order which I have offered.

I respectfully ask, Mr. President, that this honorable body now take up that question and settle it now. If the respondent's counsel desire to present further pleading on Saturday this order does not preclude that, and if the managers shall desire to present further pleading this order does not preclude that. It merely settles, Mr. President, the one question, and that is, Shall this case be tried at this session of Congress, beginning on the 7th day of the present month? That is the question, and the sole question, that is to be determined by the order. If at any time during the progress of the case it should become necessary to meet the manifest ends of justice, of course, I assume that this honorable court would do as any other court would do, give the opportunity both to the managers and to the respondent, within the bounds of reason and propriety, to present further pleadings or to amend their pleadings from time to time as justice in the case may require, and as it may meet the judgment of the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. President, the respondent and his counsel up to this morning have taken it for granted that in view of the order which was made the pleadings should be closed on or by Saturday next at the hour mentioned in the order, and that the question of the time of the trial would not be brought up until that time.

I think what has been read from the proceedings in the case against Judge Swayne confirms only what I said here the other day, that it appeared in that case the respondent was anxious and himself pressed for an early trial. The matter was before the Senate about the 1st of February and the short session was to come to an end on the 4th of March. For that reason they were waiving their rights and privileges and the usual rules which obtain in all courts, so far as I know, in regard to fixing the day of trial. Now, I do not see that any injury can be done by letting this matter come up at the time that we had reason to suppose it would come up under the order made by the Senate, which was that pleadings should close and that we should all be here at 1 o'clock or 12.30, or whatever the hour mentioned was, on Saturday next. I respectfully urge, therefore, that the Senate postpone until that hour action upon the question of fixing the time of trial.

It may seem very plain to the managers that the questions which are to be tried are already determined, but from my listening to the reading of the replication especially considering its insufficiency in regard to some of the matters which are set up in the answer, it seems to me it will be necessary for the respondent, with some degree of care, to present his reply to that replication. For all these reasons I ask that the question of fixing the date of trial be passed over for the present until Saturday when the pleading shall be closed.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for one moment to reply to some of the suggestions made by counsel. I beg to say that the replication sets up no new matter. Paragraph 1 of the replication joins issue on the questions of law which the counsel for the respondent raised in the answer; that is, it joins issue on the demurrer as to the sufficiency of the allegations. The second paragraph of the replication joins issue on those questions of fact which the answer of the respondent denies, and traverses the facts which the respondent has set up by way of confession and avoidance in his defense; so that I may say briefly there is nothing new presented in the replication of which the counsel for the respondent was not fully advised when he drew the answer.

Again, Mr. President, the proposed order is not without precedent. I find that in the last case in which the Senate sat as a Court of Impeachment the pleadings did not close until the 10th day of February. I read from the record in that case:

Ordered, That the pleadings in the matter of the impeachment of Charles Swayne having been closed, the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to proceed with the trial—

And so forth.

So it seems that the managers have not proposed anything unusual. There is nothing in the replication which can be treated by any possibility as in the nature of a surprise to the respondent or to his counsel. It is merely a joinder of issue, as I have said, on his demurrer as to the legal phases of the matter presented, a joinder of issue on the facts which the respondent denies, and a traverse of the facts which he sets up by way of confession and avoidance. I think it is not unusual, but is quite right and quite proper and just to all parties concerned, that this matter be settled now. I am sure that Senators want it settled, and I am sure the House of Representatives desires it to be settled now.

In reply to the other suggestion made by the distinguished counsel that the defendant in the Swayne case desired an early trial, it will be recalled by you, Mr. President—for I remember that the distinguished Senator who now occupies the chair was a Member of the Senate at that time—that the end of that Congress was approaching, and it was not possible to long delay the trial of that case because Congress was about to expire. It had to be tried during the month of February. So that it does not appear that the defendant was either opposed to a speedy trial or favored a speedy trial. That is a mere matter of inference, and I would have supposed that perhaps the respondent in that case, as in this case and as respondents generally do, would want time, and I suppose he did not do what he knew would be an unnecessary thing and a foolish thing to do, ask for the postponement of that case further than some time during the month of February—that Congress, during which the trial was had, was to expire by constitutional limitation on the 4th of March next following the date for which the trial was asked to be fixed.

This matter has been under consideration in the House and under consideration in the Senate itself sitting as a Court of Impeachment, and the respondent is fully apprised of the witnesses who will be examined against him. He is fully informed as to the charges, and we have suggested nothing, it seems to me, that requires any further pleading on his part. An answer similar to the one that is interposed here was interposed in Judge Swayne's behalf, and a replication similar to the one here was interposed on the part of the managers of the House. The managers on the part of the House in the late case of Swayne—since the Belknap case—proceeded largely, if not altogether, upon the plan that has been pursued in this case. It will be remembered that in the Belknap case the articles of impeachment were presented, an answer was made, followed by a replication, a rejoinder, a surrejoinder, and, in short, the system of common-law pleadings was pursued down to the similiter, which was finally filed in the case, and the trial then began.

I repeat that the replication filed in this case by the managers on the part of the House joins issue on the questions of law and fact and presents no new matter, and therefore the managers respectfully insist that the order be now entertained and entered.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. President, nothing could more clearly indicate the danger of haste in this matter in regard to the pleadings than what has just fallen from the lips of my friend Mr. Manager CLAYTON. He says we are informed of the names of the witnesses and know what is coming. Why, Mr. President, the most important question that is involved in this case, and one as to which no issue has been joined and as to which nothing has been said in the replication, is whether a judge of a court of the United States can be brought before this tribunal and tried upon a charge as to which he knows nothing except the mere general allegation that he has committed an offense. I beg leave to call the attention of the President and of the Senate to that with some particularity. In article 6 of the articles of impeachment it is simply charged:

ARTICLE 6.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, being a United States circuit judge and a judge of the United States Commerce Court, on or about the 1st day of December, 1911, did unlawfully, improperly, and corruptly attempt to use his influence as such judge with the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. and the Lehigh Valley Railway Co. to induce the officers of said companies to purchase a certain interest in a tract of coal land containing 800 acres, which interest at said time belonged to certain persons known as the Everhardt heirs.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior in office and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor.

Now, in answer to that article the respondent says:

2. That while respondent denies that on or about the 1st day of December, 1911, or at any other time, he unlawfully or improperly or corruptly or otherwise attempted to use his influence as a circuit judge or as a judge of the United States Commerce Court with the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. and the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., or with either of them, to induce the officers of said companies, or either of them, to purchase any interest belonging to persons known as the Everhardt heirs in any tract of coal land containing 800 acres, or to purchase any interest in any tract of land, respondent is advised and avers that said article is general, vague, and indefinite with regard to the offense sought to be charged therein; that it does not sufficiently inform respondent in what respect he is intended to be charged as having attempted to use his influence as United States circuit judge and judge of the United States Commerce Court with the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. and the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., in that it does not state in what said attempts consisted or with what officers or agents of said company, or either of them, or under what circumstances the alleged attempts were made, and does not in any other way give respondent such information as to the real charge intended to be made against him in the said sixth article as will enable him to prepare for trial thereon.

So, in the thirteenth article, I would like the Senate to consider the position of a judge of a Federal court who is called upon to prepare for trial on a charge of this kind:

That during the time in which the said Robert W. Archbald has acted as such United States district judge and judge of the United States Commerce Court he, the said Robert W. Archbald, at divers times and places, has sought wrongfully to obtain credit from and through certain persons who were interested in the result of suits then pending and suits that had been pending in the court over which he presided as judge of the district court, and in suits pending in the United States Commerce Court, of which the said Robert W. Archbald is a member.

In answer to that part of the thirteenth article, after setting up that it charges two offenses and ought to be dismissed for that reason, because the respondent is entitled to the separate judgment of the Senate on each charge against him and not to have two or three embodied in one article, so that there might be less than two-thirds vote him guilty on one and less than two-thirds vote him guilty on the other, but on the whole there would be two-thirds. Waiving for the present moment that consideration, I ask the Senate to take notice of the answer which we make to that charge in another respect:

3. The respondent is further advised and avers that said article is general, vague, and indefinite with respect to the first offense sought to be charged therein, to wit, the obtaining of credit from persons interested in suits pending in the courts over which respondent presided, and does not give respondent such information as to the nature and character of the charge intended to be made against him as will enable him to prepare for trial thereon in that it does not inform the respondent at what times or at what places or from what persons or under what circumstances or in what way it is intended to charge that the respondent obtained credit, and that to require the respondent to further answer said charge would not be agreeable to law or justice.

And in the summons that has been served upon the respondent he is called upon to appear here and answer to such proceedings as may be agreeable to law and justice. I have read what two of the articles charge and the answer made in regard to them; and if you will look at the replication, as I have heard it here, there is no reply to those averments of the answer. It is neither admitted nor denied that those charges are so vague and indefinite that no judge can legally or lawfully be brought into this tribunal to be tried thereon. The replication, as I remember, states:

That the said articles do severally set forth impeachable offenses.

As to that I am making no point now. Then it proceeds to deny each and every averment of the answer which denies or traverses the acts charged in the articles of impeachment. There is no reply here, and there is no issue made upon the great and important fundamental fact in this case, one as to which I would thank the managers if they can find anything which approaches a precedent, that the judge of a Federal court can be brought before this tribunal and asked to answer to an indictment—for this impeachment is nothing but an indictment—which simply charges in general terms that he has committed an offense.

We expect in some manner in our answer which we shall make to this replication to call attention to that fact and either put ourselves in a position in which we may ask the Senate to determine that those charges shall not be considered any further or that the managers may have leave to say whether they stand upon the proposition that a general charge of that kind is sufficient, or to amend their charges so that they shall be specific.

It does seem to me, Mr. President, that it is unduly pressing this respondent and the situation in which he is placed to attempt at this moment and in this way, instead of at the time it would ordinarily be supposed the matter would come up, on next Saturday, to settle the important question of fixing a day for the trial; and I ask that it be allowed to go over until the court meets on Saturday, at the time heretofore fixed.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, I beg the pardon of the Senate for occupying so much time on this matter, but I merely want to make a suggestion, and that is, that issue is joined. The very question of the insufficiency of the allegations or averments made in articles 6 and 13 is raised by an answer in the nature of a demurrer, which the respondent interposed. We have squarely met that. As I say, we have met that contention of the legal insufficiency of that averment by answer to that demurrer saying that it is sufficient. That presents a law question for the Senate to try when that question comes up after the trial is begun. That is not the question now before the court. The question now before the court is simply whether or not this court shall fix a time for the trial of this case.

As I said in the beginning, there is no disposition on the part of the managers to preclude the respondent from bringing any further pleading into this court that he may deem proper, and certainly the managers have reserved the right in their replication to bring further pleadings. It is simply a question as to when the Senate will enter upon the trial of this case. You are not now called upon to settle the pleadings; we are not asking you to do that; we are simply asking you to set this case down for trial at a particular time. On Saturday the respondent can file a further answer, if he wants to do so, and on Saturday, if we so desire, we shall ask this honorable court to give us further time to make replication to his further answer, if we deem it necessary.

There is but one question raised by this order: Will this court proceed with the trial of this case on the 7th day of August and have the witnesses subpœnaed, so that they may be here? That is all the managers have asked you to determine to-day.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. All that I am asking now, Mr. President, is that the consideration of that matter be postponed until Saturday, when the court again meets.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I should be glad if counsel for the respondent would state before we act on this question at what time they will probably be ready for trial—what time, if any, they ask in preparing for trial. I should like to hear them on that point.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Well, Mr. President, I am very anxious to have the consideration of that matter postponed, so that we may properly prepare and present it to the Senate. From what I now know of the situation, while I shall present my reasons to the Senate as fully as I can if I am required to do so now, it will simply amount to a denial of justice to attempt to bring the respondent to trial on the 7th day of August or anywhere near that time. I wish to ask consideration of the fact that there are 13 cases to be tried here instead of 1, and we shall require a great deal of time for that. I should very much like if we could have until Saturday to be able to present to the Senate fully a statement as to the time we shall ask and why we ask it. It is only for the reason that I want time for proper preparation for the discussion of that question that I am asking that the matter go over until Saturday. If the Senate insists that it be taken up now, I will do the best I can.

Mr. CUMMINS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is the question now pending the adoption or rejection of the motion proposed by the managers of the House of Representatives or is it upon the motion or request made by counsel for respondent that a decision of the matter be deferred until Saturday?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will respond that counsel for the respondent has not presented any order upon which he has asked the action of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understood, however, that counsel for the respondent asked the Senate to postpone until Saturday the fixing of the time for trial. Is that in such form as to permit the Senate to act upon it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is for the Senate to determine. The rule prescribes that if any Senator requires it, any motion made either by the managers or counsel shall be reduced to writing and in that way be presented to the Senate.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I was about to say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will be glad to submit any motion which counsel for the respondent may make.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. The rule which you have adopted would permit counsel for the respondent or the managers to make orally any request for an order, but it must be reduced to writing if required.

I make orally the motion that the question of fixing a date for the trial be postponed until the court convenes on Saturday next.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, counsel simply suggests one reason why this order should not be adopted, namely, that it should not be made at this time, but later, and the issue is very squarely presented by the order itself, and in my opinion the vote should be taken on the order. If Senators believe the order should not be taken to-day, because of the suggestion of counsel that it is called for too early, there is sufficient reason for voting against it, and therefore it seems to me the better practice is to take the vote directly upon the order presented.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, pursuant to Rule XIX, I move that the doors of the Senate be closed while the Senate is deliberating upon this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the doors of the Senate be closed while the Senate is deliberating upon this question.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. President, before a vote is taken upon that question, may I be assured or may I assume that the Senate, if it decides to entertain now, instead of Saturday, the motion to fix the 7th of August, will give us an opportunity to be heard before it is passed upon?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is for the Senate to determine.

Mr. STONE. Why can not counsel be heard now on that—before we go into executive session?

Mr. OVERMAN. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina will state his question of order.

Mr. OVERMAN. The motion having been made for the closing of the doors, I think there is nothing else before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. If counsel desire to be heard further, I withhold my motion for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota withdraws the motion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The counsel did not indicate to the Senator from Minnesota the length of time he would wish. I understood the Senator from Minnesota to ask that counsel would at least give us an indication of the length of time he would probably apply for when he made his motion and urged it. That, I think, would be valuable information for the Senate, even in considering the question whether we shall postpone the formal hearing until next Saturday. I think we would all be glad to have an indication from counsel as to the time to which he would probably move that the case be postponed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand the request of the counsel, it is to the effect that he may have until Saturday to determine what time it will be necessary for him to have in order to try this cause, and counsel have requested at this time not what is in the nature of a postponement, but in the nature of a request for time for preparation, to enable him to advise the Senate when they will be ready for trial. I do not see, therefore, very well how the counsel could advise us at this time of that with respect to which he desires time to seek information.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not understand counsel to express his views in that way. I understood he wanted until Saturday as the time to present his motion for a postponement. I did not understand him to indicate that he could not now give us some intimation as to the length of time to which he would wish to postpone the case if we agree to his view of postponement.

My reason for adding the suggestion to what was said by the Senator from Minnesota is the peculiar condition in which we are at present. The time of the year, the length of time the session has already lasted, make it desirable for all of us to know as early as possible if the case is to be postponed, the time to which the postponement is to take place. I still think, if counsel can do so, it would be valuable to many of us to know the length of time for which he would probably ask a postponement, if he now knows.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. President, I should say, from my present information as to what will be required in this case and the means we have of doing it, that it will be utterly impossible for the respondent to be properly prepared for trial before the 15th day of October.

I am at a great loss to know what I ought to say at this time as to the reasons why we ask for that time, or whether the Senate will first pass upon the question whether I may have until Saturday to prepare myself on that subject. It does not seem to me that any great harm can come from waiting from now until Saturday at noon for the purpose of enabling us to prepare and to state properly to the Senate the reasons why we ask for a delay until the 15th of October.

Mr. WORKS. If counsel for the respondent is through, I want to suggest that if counsel now believe that he shall desire as long a time as that, which would take us beyond the present session of Congress, probably, there should be some understanding on the part of the Senate as to whether a formal showing will be required or a sufficient ground for a continuance, so that if the matter should be postponed until Saturday, counsel may understand that in order to secure a continuance it will be necessary on his part to make some showing that will be satisfactory to the Senate.

I suppose there is no Member of this body who is more anxious to see this session of Congress brought to a close than I am, but this is an important matter which, it seems to me, should be disposed of and disposed of speedily. The respondent would naturally desire on his own part that the case should be speedily tried, if he can properly prepare himself for the trial. On the other hand, the Government is interested in the question whether one charged with high crimes and misdemeanors shall be permitted to hold his seat upon the bench for an unnecessary length of time. In a case of this kind there should be no unnecessary delay, and yet the respondent should have every reasonable opportunity to prepare himself for the trial.

It does seem to me that for that reason there should be some understanding between the Senate and counsel for the respondent whether the Senate is willing to postpone the trial of this case until the 15th of October merely upon the request of counsel, or whether a formal showing of ground for continuance will be required. That, I think, should be done now, in justice to counsel.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia obtained the floor.

Mr. LODGE. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts will state his question of order.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Minnesota made a motion, as provided by the rule, that the Senate consider this question behind closed doors. He withdrew it in order to give counsel for the respondent an opportunity to state the time he desired. I think it is clearly out of order to go on and discuss the merits of the question, inasmuch as the motion to consider it behind closed doors has been made.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I understood the Senator from Minnesota to withdraw his motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota withdrew that motion and the Senator from Virginia has the floor.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I will proceed to say what I had in mind. I hope the Senator from Minnesota will not again present his motion. I hope we will proceed in open session to consider every question involved in this case and every phase of the case, and that there will be no closed doors on any proposition that may arise. But, of course, I simply throw out that in passing for the consideration of the Senator from Minnesota.

What I desire to say at present is this: The managers on the part of the House have moved that the 7th day of August be fixed as the time to proceed with the trial of this case. Counsel for respondent asks that that motion may not be disposed of to-day. He states that he desires to give reasons why the case should not be proceeded with on the 7th of August, but that he is not prepared to give those reasons to-day. He simply asks until day after to-morrow to prepare and present to the Senate the reasons which he desires to present to show that we ought not to proceed with the trial of this case on the 7th of August.

It seems to me it is a matter of very little consequence whether we fix the time to-day or day after to-morrow. I am anxious that it shall be done at the earliest practicable moment. If this case is to be proceeded with to the end before an adjournment of the Senate, I am anxious to know it. The Members of the House are, of course, anxious to know it. But we can not afford to be harsh or unreasonable or to deny any right or to do any injustice in respect to this matter, and surely no harm will come to anyone by giving counsel until day after to-morrow to present his reasons why the case should not be proceeded with on the 7th day of August.

I will be much gratified if the managers on the part of the House can see their way clear to let the consideration of the motion submitted by them go over until Saturday.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, I have conferred with my associate managers, and I think the suggestion made by the Senator from Virginia is a very proper and reasonable one. In view of the reasons he has assigned for postponing the further consideration of the order which I proposed to the court this morning, we will adopt the suggestion made by the Senator from Virginia and agree that the further consideration of this order to fix the time for the trial of this case for the 7th day of August be postponed until Saturday next—day after to-morrow. We shall then respectfully insist upon the adoption of that order and upon an early trial of this case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Counsel on the part of the respondent asks that the consideration of the question as to when the trial shall be proceeded with be postponed for determination until Saturday. Is there objection? If not, by unanimous consent it is so ordered. Is there any other matter the managers on the part of the House desire to present?

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. There is nothing else, Mr. President, and having no other business before the Senate, we beg leave at this time to retire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls attention to the fact that there is no regular order as to the hour of meeting of the Senate for the trial of the impeachment. Possibly it may be necessary to make one at this time.

Mr. LODGE. Did not the previous order fix the hour for the meeting on Saturday?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order which was presented by the Senator from Massachusetts on a previous date and which was adopted by the Senate related only to this day.

Mr. LODGE. Only to this day?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Then I move that when the court adjourns to-day it be to meet at 2 o'clock on Saturday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the Senate order that when the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment adjourns to-day it shall be to meet at 2 o'clock on Saturday next. Is there objection? If not, it will be so ordered, by unanimous consent.

The managers on the part of the House thereupon retired from the Chamber.

The respondent and his counsel withdrew from the Chamber.

The Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment thereupon (at 1 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m) adjourned until Saturday, August 3, 1912, at 2 o'clock p. m.

FOREIGN OCCUPATIONS ON AMERICAN CONTINENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, and by unanimous consent, the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, stands adjourned until August 3, at 2 o'clock. The Senate is now sitting in legislative session. The Chair will call attention to the fact that a resolution is pending. It has already been read. It will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A resolution (S. Res. 371) by Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, declaring the attitude of the United States under certain conditions as to the possession or ownership of certain strategic alien harbors within the American continents.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent, if it is necessary to obtain unanimous consent——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests to the Senator from North Carolina that the pending resolution can only be acted upon in the morning hour, which has nearly expired.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution reported by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. STONE. I object.

Mr. LODGE. There is no question of objection. The resolution comes up——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was about to put the question.

Mr. LODGE. I beg pardon.

Mr. Latta, one of the secretaries of the President of the United States, appeared at the bar of the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, a message from the President of the United States is here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution reported by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. STONE. I desire to be heard on the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri desires to be heard.

Meanwhile, the Senate will receive a message from the President of the United States.

[A message from the President of the United States was received, announcing his approval of sundry bills and joint resolutions. The approvals appear in another part of to-day's proceedings.]

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

SEVERAL SENATORS. Question!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri has addressed the Chair. Does the Senator from Missouri desire to proceed?

Mr. STONE. It being within two minutes of 2 o'clock, when the resolution will go over automatically, I ask that its consideration be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. GALLINGER. Without losing its place.

Mr. LODGE. Without losing its place. To that I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request is that, without prejudice, action upon the pending resolution be postponed until to-morrow. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

THE TARIFF BILLS.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to ask if it is agreeable to the Senator from North Carolina that the tariff bills should be placed before the Senate so that conferees may be appointed?

Mr. SIMMONS. I rose for the purpose of making that request, but at the suggestion of the Chair I deferred it.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts and joint resolutions:

On July 31:

S. 7027. An act to prohibit the importation and the interstate transportation of films or other pictorial representations of prize fights, and for other purposes.

On August 1:

S. J. Res. 100. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to permit the continuation of coal-mining operations on certain lands in Wyoming;

S. J. Res. 122. Joint resolution providing for the payment of the expenses of the Senate in the impeachment trial of Robert W. Archbald; and

S. 4930. An act to harmonize the national law of salvage with the provisions of the international convention for the unification of certain rules with respect to assistance and salvage at sea, and for other purposes.

TARIFF DUTIES ON WOOL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 22195) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina moves that the Senate insist upon its amendments and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Before that motion is put, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to memorials which I have here from 2,386 working people in the State of Michigan in one industry, and which I was requested to present as a protest against the reduction of tariff duties.

If the Chair will permit me, out of order, I should like to send the protest to the desk and I would like to have the first one read. It is very brief.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. PENROSE. I must object to the memorial being read until after the question of a conference on these bills has been disposed of.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think it very appropriate to have it read now for the information of Senators.

Mr. PENROSE. That may be, but I must object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania objects to the reading of the memorial. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The motion of the Senator from North Carolina is debatable, as I understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to have the memorials returned to my desk, and I will endeavor to make their contents clear in my own way.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. It will be so ordered, without objection.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that upon the disposition of the request of the Senator from North Carolina I shall ask unanimous consent that the Senate resume the consideration of House bill 21279, the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the motion before the Senate, as I understand it, is the question of insistence upon the amendments made by the Senate and the appointment of conferees. Am I right?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that under the rules the laying of the message of the House before the Senate is always in order, and that has been done. The question as to what shall be done with it is a matter for the disposition of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Upon that point I desire to address the Senate briefly, if in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter is not now before the Senate, unless the Senate so orders.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. May I ask what question is before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina has moved that the Senate insist on its amendments and ask a conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate. The matter is now before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, my purpose in rising is to avail myself of the constitutional privilege of the people of the State of Michigan to memorialize Congress in their own way. Not knowing just what course may be taken upon these tariff bills, and desiring to give encouragement to the conferees who are to be appointed, that they may not lightly yield to this attack upon cherished principles long entertained by the people and recognized as essential to the American system of government, I desire to present these memorials from workingmen in a great Michigan industry.

They come in formal protest, as I said a few moments ago, from 2,386 laboring people in one single industry in the city of Detroit. They represent 558 persons employed in the main division, 329 persons in the service division, 274 persons in the body division, 217 persons in the truck departments, 260 persons in the body paint shop, 205 persons in the chassis machine department, 156 persons in the motor room, 104 persons in the foundry, 97 persons in the office, 54 in the forge, 51 carpenters, millwrights, steam fitters, electricians, et cetera, and 26 persons employed in the ironing room of the Packard Automobile Co. at Detroit.

These people claim—and justly, I believe—that foreseeing a disposition on the part of our opponents in Congress to reduce the tariff, they are impelled to protest against that course on the ground that their employments are jeopardized by this threatened assault on the protective policy of our Government, unnecessarily inviting ruinous foreign competition.

They believe that the price of labor is much less abroad than it is here, and that the cost of production is greater here than it is abroad; and acting strictly within their rights they have formulated these various protests against the reduction of tariff duties.

The memorial is as follows:

We, the undersigned members of the American motor-car industry, foreseeing that tariff reductions on foreign-built motor cars and motor-car parts will admit to our market on equal terms a product on which the price of labor is much less than that of our own, realize that the certain result must be either the loss of the market or a corresponding cut in the American price of labor.

We therefore petition Henry B. Joy as chairman of the committee of manufacturers to protest to the House of Representatives on behalf of ourselves and all other employees of this industry, against any legislation tending to cheapen the American product and so to reduce the wage standard of American workingmen.

I think they are justified in their apprehensions, and I want to urge the Senate to carefully consider this protest against unfair competition from Europe.

Having this in mind, I have risen at this time because I do not know who the conferees upon these bills are to be, but I do know that the principle involved in this legislation is serious and important to the American people, and that a radical change menaces American production and the permanency of the American wage scale; therefore I offer these protests.

Mr. NELSON. I would suggest, if the Senator will allow me, that the memorials be referred to the Senate members of the conference committee on the wool bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Acting upon the suggestion of my distinguished friend from Minnesota, I prefer the request that these memorials be respectfully referred to the conferees on the part of the Senate on the tariff bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], that the Senate insist upon its amendments and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. BAILEY, and Mr. SIMMONS conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorials presented by the Senator from Michigan will be referred to the conferees, without objection.

THE SUGAR SCHEDULE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the bill (H. R. 21213) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and accede to the request of the House for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that five conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. PENROSE, Mr. LODGE, Mr. BRISTOW, Mr. BAILEY, and Mr. SIMMONS conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE EXCISE TAX.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 21214) to extend the special excise tax now levied with respect to doing business by corporations to persons, and to provide revenue for the Government by levying a special excise tax with respect to doing business by individuals and copartnerships, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. STONE. What are the amendments?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There is the tariff commission amendment.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. And the repeal of the Canadian reciprocity act.

Mr. STONE. I do not insist upon those amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion made by the Senator from North Carolina.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. BAILEY, Mr. SIMMONS, and Mr. LA FOLLETTE conferees on the part of the Senate.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BOURNE. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now resume the consideration of House bill 21279, the Post Office appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21279) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

Mr. BOURNE. I will state that in the information print we completed last evening paragraph 85, so that the Secretary will now begin the reading in the information print at paragraph 86.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 28, beginning with line 11, the committee proposes to insert the following:

That hereafter, in addition to the salaries by law provided, the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to make travel allowances in lieu of actual expenses, at fixed rates per annum, not exceeding in the aggregate the sum annually appropriated, to railway postal clerks, acting railway postal clerks, and substitute railway postal clerks, including substitute railway postal clerks for railway postal clerks granted leave with pay on account of sickness, assigned to duty in railway post-office cars, while on duty, after 10 hours from the time of beginning their initial run, under such regulations as he may prescribe, and in no case shall such an allowance exceed $1 per day.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to ask the Senator from Oregon what "acting railway postal clerks" are? What class do they belong to? I know we have railway postal clerks and substitute railway postal clerks, but what are acting railway postal clerks?

Mr. BOURNE. I will state for the information of the Senator from New Hampshire that this was an amendment which was brought to the committee and its adoption strongly urged by the department. It was prepared in the department, and it was the opinion of the committee that it was an administrative matter. From the statement presented to the committee, they felt that it would benefit very much the efficiency of the department, and it was adopted and recommended by the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. What puzzles me is that these clerks are under the civil service. They are railway postal clerks, and there are the substitute clerks who take the place of the regular clerks when they are off duty for any reason. Does this contemplate that there shall be another class outside of civil-service employees, who are to be acting railway postal clerks whom some one will appoint? I simply want to find out just what it means; that is all.

Mr. BOURNE. It would be purely an inference on my part in reference to that. I presume that a person who was not in the regular substitute class but who is on the eligible list would be appointed temporarily to act. I do not imagine that any new class is to be introduced or that there is to be any innovation in the service.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that he make inquiry in regard to the matter.

Mr. BOURNE. I will do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will not interpose any objection to the amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have had little opportunity to examine this bill. I therefore want to ask the Senator in charge of it whether the effect of that part of the amendment which appears at line 11, page 28, is not to pay or may it not pay more money than the actual expenses. It reads:

That hereafter, in addition to the salaries by law provided, the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to make travel allowances in lieu of actual expenses, at fixed rates per annum.

Mr. BOURNE. If the Senator will allow me, the next line fixes a limitation, and the concluding line is a limitation, "not exceeding in the aggregate the sum annually appropriated," and in the concluding line of the amendment, "in no case shall such an allowance exceed $1 per day."

Mr. REED. I should like to know why we go from the policy of actual expense to the policy of a fixed allowance. It may be absolutely all right, but I should like to have some explanation.

Mr. BOURNE. I will state for the information of the Senator from Missouri that this amendment was strongly urged for the consideration of the committee on the part of the department for the purpose of avoiding greater labor, delay, and expense in preparing the pay rolls, checking them, and verifying them, and signing the authorizations for each roll. This plan was proposed in order that expense allowances may be a stated amount in lieu of actual expenses paid.

It was fully explained before the House committee, and the explanation is found on pages 273 and 275 of the hearings before the House committee.

The statement of the department is that the change proposed is a slight verbal one in existing law.

That hereafter, in addition to the salaries by law provided, the Postmaster General is hereby authorized—

And then follows the amendment as submitted by the committee.

Mr. REED. Is it the rule now in existence to pay the actual expenses, or do they not get any expenses now?

Mr. BOURNE. The rule is now the payment of the actual expenses. For the purpose of simplicity in keeping the pay rolls they recommend this change. The discretionary power detailed to the department is limited, according to the terms of the proposed amendment, to $1 per day, and it can not exceed the limitation contained in line 14.

The total amount of the appropriation or payment that might be made under this appropriation or the authority granted can not exceed "in the aggregate the sum annually appropriated." In my opinion, every precaution is taken, so that if the amendment is adopted the appropriation can not be misused.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it is always embarrassing to talk about a matter that one must frankly admit in advance he is unfamiliar with. I am in that position, and I expect many Senators are, with reference to this appropriation bill and other appropriation bills. But if I grasp the situation aright, it is this: At the present time these division superintendents and clerks are reimbursed for the actual outlay while on the road. It is proposed to substitute for that the payment of a fixed sum, or a sum to be fixed by the head of the department, which shall not exceed the amount named in the bill in the aggregate nor exceed the sum of $1 per day for each man, and this is done for the purpose of simplifying and making easier the keeping of accounts. Boiled down, it means in practical operation that $1 a day will be paid to these men, and that is all there is of it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think perhaps I can from my memory of the previous Post Office appropriation bills make a correct statement of this situation.

A number of years ago provision was made for the payment of expenses of railway postal clerks while absent from home on duty, but the amount appropriated was not sufficient, and the department was only able to pay to the clerks an amount, as I remember it, the first year, of about 16 cents per day—a very small allowance. In subsequent years the clerks made constant application to the department for their actual traveling expenses, and one year after another the amount of the appropriation was increased, until it is now made absolute at not to exceed $1 per day while the clerk is absent from his home.

My impression is that this allowance has been considered by the clerks and is considered by the department as a reasonable adjustment of the difficulty. It is something in addition to what the clerks formerly received and is in the nature of compensation to them while they are absent from home.

Mr. BOURNE. The statement of the Senator from Nebraska expresses the situation as it exists. I find on reference to the hearings that the Second Assistant Postmaster General, Mr. Stewart, said:

> We are paying under the present appropriation an allowance of 60 cents. The limitation of the law is $1 a day, but the appropriation was not adequate to pay the entire amount. That was for the first quarter, but we find that we can allow probably 75 cents for the two remaining quarters, and we are making arrangements to do that.
> The CHAIRMAN. The estimate you make here is intended to allow the limit of $1 a day?
>
> Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir; that covers the entire amount.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. That is suggested from the experience of the last two years?
>
> Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir.
> We have to suggest, in view of the great labor in making these appointments, preparing the pay rolls, checking them and verifying them, and then signing authorizations for each roll, which takes the time and efforts of many clerks and officers of the service, that there should be a change made in the law so as to allow travel allowance equal to these amounts in lieu of actual expenses, so that we can make an order at the beginning of the year, for instance, stating for each clerk his travel allowance to which his line is entitled, and which will be paid the same as salary is paid. Every run will have a stated expense allowance based upon the provision of the law and the actual expenses of the clerk. If a clerk changes his run, a new order changing his travel allowance would be made, and that would remain in force until his position changed again.
> The CHAIRMAN. And that would stop all this bookkeeping?
> Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir; all the routine work. We believe it would be economy to change the plan in that respect.

Mr. REED. At present the clerk would be entitled to his actual expenses, provided a sufficient amount had been appropriated. Under the proposed rule the department head or chief would arbitrarily in advance fix the amount of expense to go to each man, dependent upon the conclusion the department chief had arrived at with reference to the amount of actual expenses. So the department will now, under this proposed rule, fix the amount of expense money to go to each man instead of the man receiving what he actually expends. They have had their actual expenses if there was enough money, as I understand it, but there has never been enough to quite pay them. How much will this plan increase the expense to the Government?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I should like to ask the Senator if he can conceive of any case where the expense of traveling would be less than a dollar a day?

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. That is perhaps for a meal, and I do not think he will get overburdened on that if paid a dollar a day for it.

Mr. REED. The Senator, perhaps, misapprehends the purpose of my inquiry. I am not trying to beat these men down to lower figures than they ought to have. I am trying to get some light on the question as to what increased expense this will make to the Government and whether, in fact, it will work a hardship on the men by transferring their present right of their actual expenses into a right which is controlled by the department chief.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I understood the chairman of the committee to say that at present they are getting about 75 cents a day.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will state to the Senator from Missouri that postal clerks have never had their actual expenses, but there has been an allowance heretofore of so much per day in lieu of expenses.

This year the maximum allowance for expenses is more than it has ever been heretofore. Formerly they received no allowance whatever for expenses, but paid their own expenses on the road. Subsequently they were allowed 25 cents a day, and afterwards 50 cents a day. This year it has been increased to a dollar a day, which is a more liberal allowance than has ever before been made.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Missouri yield a moment that I may ask the Senator from Kansas a question?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I understand—and the Senator will correct me if I am wrong—that, as he says, originally the mail clerks had no expense allowance. Then we made a sort of partial allowance that has never been large enough to enable them to pay their actual expenses?

Mr. BRISTOW. That is right.

Mr. WARREN. As I understand, the present proposition is to pay their actual expenses—no more and no less?

Mr. BRISTOW. No; the plan is to pay their expenses, but not to exceed $1 a day. The allowance for this purpose is limited to a dollar a day.

Mr. WARREN. Yes, I understand that; I should have so stated. It is for their actual expenses up to a dollar a day, but it is not intended to pay a dollar a day as such.

Mr. BRISTOW. No.

Mr. WARREN. Not unless their expenses amount to that. I think these mail clerks ought to have it, by all means. They ought not to be obliged to pay their expenses from their private funds while on duty away from their homes. I do not think there is any expectation that the maximum of a dollar a day will be exceeded except in rare cases; but if the $1 a day be found insufficient I would favor placing the limit higher.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I grant fully, without any cavil, the proposition that if the salaries of these men are now insufficient they should be increased to a point where they are fair and adequate, but I do not care whether that increase is made by a direct increase in the salary or by an allowance for expenses while upon the road. There is no question there that would be worth discussion. I had risen originally to get some light upon this proposition. The objection I see to it in its present form is found in a few lines; and I think it is an objection. The bill provides:

> That hereafter in addition to the salaries by law provided the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to make travel allowances in lieu of actual expenses, at fixed rates per annum, not exceeding in the aggregate the sum annually appropriated.

Then in the last line is the provision:

> Under such regulations as he may prescribe, and in no case shall such an allowance exceed $1 per day.

That puts in the hands of the Postmaster General the power to farm this money out, to say where it shall go. It is not provided that it shall be distributed to all alike; and it seems to me that if we are to give these clerks a dollar a day for expense money while they are upon the road, then the law ought to provide that they shall get this money as a matter of right under the law and not as a matter of executive order from the Postmaster General, for he may distribute the money more liberally upon one run than upon another.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, let me call the Senator's attention to a condition in a region of country with which he is doubtless familiar. I remember there is a postal run from Lawrence, Kans., to Gridley on what is known as the Lawrence-Ottawa branch of the Sante Fe Railroad. The clerk leaves Lawrence in the morning and gets back in the evening; he lives at home and is away only for one meal. A railway clerk may go out of Kansas City for La Junta in Colorado, and he is away from home for two days, perhaps three; I do not remember just how long the run is. Does not the Senator from Missouri see that there would be more equity in allowing the full amount to a clerk running from Kansas City to La Junta, who is away all the time for two or three days, than there would be in allowing the full amount to the clerk who would be away from home only for his noon meal? Conditions like that arise everywhere, and there must be some latitude allowed to the administrative department in apportioning the fund where the service is of that character.

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, I, of course, understand there may be varying conditions, but I am opposed to placing the money in the hands of the Postmaster General and giving to him the right to distribute it practically at will, trusting alone to his discretion. It is not the wise thing to do. There have been already, either granted by Congress or taken over by the Post Office Department, powers that are so arbitrary and that are being so grossly abused times out of number that I hesitate to increase the powers of that department. There may be difficulties to arrange, but it seems to me to grant to the head of a department this large sum of money, practically to be expended in his discretion, is not in accordance with the usual methods of granting money, and that, instead of giving it to the Postmaster General to distribute it as he may see fit, it would be much wiser if the committee would formulate some rules under which these employees would obtain this money as a matter of right.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Missouri, though I do not want to interrupt him——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. BOURNE. Has the Senator evolved any plan which he thinks would be an improvement over this one?

Mr. REED. Well, as I stand here on the floor, I would not undertake to evolve a plan. I am not a universal genius, but——

Mr. BOURNE. The Senator's point is that this is an invitation to favoritism, as I understand?

Mr. REED. Exactly; and I have a further objection, if the Senator pleases, that it is not in accordance with the usual custom to grant a large sum of money and to allow a department chief to distribute it without laying down the rules specifically under which it shall be distributed.

Mr. BOURNE. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to get his viewpoint. Suppose we allow a per diem in addition to the salary paid, would there not, in his judgment, be an insistent demand later on for a travel allowance on the part of Government employees?

Mr. REED. Not if you made the amount in lieu of travel expenses and paid it specifically for that purpose and gave it to them absolutely. I think we should say where it should go, instead of leaving it in the discretion largely of the Postmaster General, from whose decision there is, in fact, no appeal. I wish the Senator would consider that. I do not wish to delay the bill.

Mr. BOURNE. I would be very glad to let this matter go over if the Senator thinks he can work out a plan that would be an improvement, and consider that later on; or I would be very glad to let this matter go through and then take the matter up in conference, as, of course, it will go into conference, as it is an amendment on the part of the Senate.

Mr. REED. That is satisfactory to me. I merely wanted to call attention to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 28, line 24, after the words "postal clerks," to insert "including substitute railway postal clerks for railway postal clerks granted leave with pay on account of sickness," so as to make the clause read:

For travel allowances to railway postal clerks, acting railway postal clerks, and substitute railway postal clerks, including substitute railway postal clerks for railway postal clerks granted leave with pay on account of sickness, $1,340,743.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, line 4, after the word "hire," to strike out "in classes 1 and 2," and, in line 5, before the word "thousand," to strike out "sixty" and insert "ninety," so as to make the clause read:

For temporary clerk hire for emergency service, $90,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, line 6, after the word "vacation," to strike out "$72,000" and insert "$108,000," so as to make the clause read:

For substitutes for clerks on vacation, $108,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, line 17, before the word "substitute," to insert "or"; in the same line, after the words "postal clerk," to strike out "sea post clerk, or substitute sea post clerk"; and in line 21, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-one" and insert "sixty," so as to make the clause read:

For acting clerks in place of clerks or substitutes injured while on duty, who shall be granted leave of absence with full pay during the period of disability, but not exceeding one year, then at the rate of 50 per cent of the clerk's annual salary for the period of disability exceeding one year, but not exceeding 12 months additional, and to enable the Postmaster General to pay the sum of $2,000, which shall be exempt from payment of debts of the deceased, to the legal representatives of any railway postal clerk, or substitute railway postal clerk, who shall be killed while on duty or who, being injured while on duty, shall die within one year thereafter as the result of such injury, $160,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, line 2, before the word "dollars," to strike out "sixty thousand" and insert "seventy-five thousand," so as to make the clause read:

For actual and necessary expenses, division superintendents, assistant division superintendents, and chief clerks, Railway Mail Service, and railway postal clerks, while actually traveling on business of the Post Office Department and away from their several designated headquarters, $75,000: Provided, That of this sum $15,000 shall be immediately available.

Mr. BOURNE. I ask that the amendment proposed by the Senate committee be rejected. It was found, after the amendment had been reported, that there was no necessity for the increased amount, the House amount being sufficient.

The amendment was rejected.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill, on page 30, in line 2, and read as follows:

Provided, That of this sum $15,000 shall be immediately available.

Mr. BOURNE. I move that that proviso be stricken out.

The motion was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 30, line 5, before the word "miscellaneous," to strike out "and"; in the same line, after the word "miscellaneous," to insert "and"; in line 7, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "eighty"; and in line 8, after the word "headquarters," to insert "and chief clerks," so as to make the clause read:

For rent, light, fuel, telegraph, miscellaneous, and office expenses, schedules of mail trains, telephone service, and badges for railway postal clerks, $80,000, including rental of offices for division headquarters, and chief clerks, Railway Mail Service, in Washington, D. C.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, line 15, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three" and insert "four"; in line 16, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand eight hundred and thirty-one" and insert "four thousand two hundred and ninety-six"; in line 19, before the word "dollars," to strike out "six hundred" and insert "seven hundred"; in the same line, before the word "hundred," to strike out "four" and insert "nine"; and in line 20, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty-one" and insert "ninety-six," so as to make the clause read:

For per diem allowance of assistant superintendents while actually traveling on official business away from their home, their official domicile, and their headquarters, at a rate to be fixed by the Postmaster General, not to exceed $4 per day, $4,296, and for their necessary official expenses not covered by their per diem allowance, not exceeding $700; in all, $4,996.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 31, line 23, after the word "dollars," to strike out ", to cover one-half of the cost of transportation, compensation, and expenses of clerks to be employed in assorting and pouching mails in transit on steamships between the United States and other postal administrations in the International Postal Union" and insert ", to cover the cost to the United States of maintaining sea-post service on steamships conveying the mails"; on page 32, line 7, after the word "piers," to strike out "and"; in line 9, after the word "piers," to insert ", and for transferring the foreign mail from incoming steamships at Honolulu from quarantine to the peirs"; and in line 13, after the words "United States mail," to insert "Provided, That acting clerks may be employed in place of clerks or substitutes injured while on duty who shall be granted leave of absence with full pay during the period of disability, but not exceeding one year, then at the rate of 50 per cent of the clerk's annual salary for the period of disability exceeding 1 year but not exceeding 12 months additional, and that the Postmaster General may pay the sum of $2,000, which shall be exempt from payment of debts of the deceased, to the legal representative of any sea-post clerk or substitute sea-post clerk who shall be killed while on duty, or who, being injured while on duty, shall die within one year thereafter as the result of such injury"; so as to make the clause read:

For transportation of foreign mails, $3,748,400: Provided, That the Postmaster General shall be authorized to expend such sums as may be necessary, not exceeding $111,000, to cover the cost to the United States of maintaining sea-post service on steamships conveying the mails, and not exceeding $80,000 for transferring the foreign mail from incoming steamships in New York Bay to the steamship and railway piers, for transferring the foreign mail from incoming steamships in San Francisco Bay to the piers, and for transferring the foreign mail from incoming steamships at Honolulu from quarantine to the piers; also for transferring the mail from steamships performing service under contract for transporting United States mail: Provided, That acting clerks may be employed in place of clerks or substitutes injured while on duty, who shall be granted leave of absence with full pay during the period of disability, but not exceeding one year, then at the rate of 50 per cent of the clerk's annual salary for the period of disability exceeding one year but not exceeding 12 months additional, and that the Postmaster General may pay the sum of $2,000, which shall be exempt from payment of debts of the deceased, to the legal representative of any sea-post clerk or substitute sea-post clerk who shall be killed while on duty, or who, being injured while on duty, shall die within one year thereafter as the result of such injury: Provided further, That the sum of $6,000 be immediately available for the payment to the widow or next of kin of J. S. March, O. S. Woody, and W. L. Gwinn, sea-post clerks, who lost their lives on the steamship Titanic, said sum to be equally divided, $2,000 to each widow or next of kin.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, line 13, after the words "appointed by the," to strike out "President" and insert "Postmaster General, from the Post Office Department," and in line 14, before the word "thousand," to strike out "two" and insert "five," so as to make the clause read:

For two delegates to the International Postal Union at Madrid, 1913, to be appointed by the Postmaster General, from the Post Office Department, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the Third Assistant Postmaster General," on page 33, line 25, before the word "envelopes," to strike out "and official," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of agent and assistants to examine and distribute stamped envelopes and newspaper wrappers, and expenses of agency at Dayton, Ohio, $22,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, line 11, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "forty-five," and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert "of which the sum of $10,000 shall be immediately available for the fiscal year 1911," so as to make the clause read:

For payment of limited indemnity for the loss of pieces of domestic registered matter, first, third, and fourth classes, $45,000, of which the sum of $10,000 shall be immediately available for the fiscal year 1911.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, line 15, after the word "mails," to insert "in accordance with convention stipulations"; in line 16, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "seventeen"; in line 17, before the word "thousand," to strike out "eight" and insert "seven"; and in line 18, after the word "available," to insert "for the fiscal year 1911," so as to make the clause read:

For payment of limited indemnity for the loss of registered articles in the international mails, in accordance with convention stipulations, $17,000, of which $7,000 shall be immediately available for the fiscal year 1911.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, after line 21, to insert:

For the employment of special counsel, to be appointed by the Attorney General when requested by the Postmaster General, and at compensation to be fixed by the Attorney General, not exceeding this temporary appropriation, to prosecute and defend, on behalf of the Post Office Department, all suits now pending or which may hereafter arise affecting the second-class mailing privilege, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 35, line 16, after the word "health," to insert "and by State boards or departments of public charities and corrections," so as to read:

That from and after the passage of this act all periodical publications issued from a known place of publication at stated intervals, and as frequently as four times a year, by or under the auspices of a benevolent or fraternal society or order organized under the lodge system and having a bona fide membership of not less than 1,000 persons, or by a regularly incorporated institution of learning, or by a regularly established State institution of learning supported in whole or in part by public taxation, or by or under the auspices of a trades-union, and all publications of strictly professional, literary, historical, or scientific societies, including the bulletins issued by State boards of health, and by State boards or departments of public charities and corrections, shall be admitted to the mails as second-class matter, and the postage thereon shall be the same as on other second-class matter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriation relative to admitting to the mails as second-class matter periodical publications issued from a known place of publication at stated intervals, etc., on page 36, line 11, after the word "publications," to strike out "Provided, That the circulation through the mails of periodical publications, issued by or under the auspices of benevolent or fraternal societies or orders or trades-unions, or by strictly professional, literary, historical, or scientific societies, as second-class matter, shall be limited to copies mailed to members, exchanges, and bona fide subscribers, together with 10 per cent of such circulation in addition as sample copies" and insert "Provided, That the circulation through the mails of periodical publications issued by, or under the auspices of, benevolent or fraternal societies or orders, or trades-unions, or by strictly professional, literary, historical, or scientific societies, as second-class mail matter, shall be limited to copies mailed to such members as pay therefor, either as a part of their dues or assessments, or otherwise, not less than 50 per cent of the regular subscription price; to other bona fide subscribers; to exchanges, and 10 per cent of such circulation as sample copies," so as to read:

But such periodical publications, hereby permitted to carry advertising matter, must not be designed or published primarily for advertising purposes, and shall be originated and published to further the objects and purposes of such benevolent or fraternal societies or orders, trades-unions, or other societies, respectively; and all such periodicals shall be formed of printed paper sheets, without board, cloth, leather, or other substantial binding, such as distinguish printed books for preservation from periodical publications: Provided, That the circulation through the mails of periodical publications issued by, or under the auspices of, benevolent or fraternal societies or orders, or trades-unions, or by strictly professional, literary, historical, or scientific societies, as second-class mail matter, shall be limited to copies mailed to such members as pay therefor, either as a part of their dues or assessments, or otherwise, not less than 50 per cent of the regular subscription price; to other bona fide subscribers; to exchanges, and 10 per cent of such circulation as sample copies: Provided further, That the office of publication of any such periodical publication shall be fixed by the association or body by which it is published, or by its executive board, and such publication shall be printed at such place and entered at the nearest post office thereto.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, it may seem a little ungracious to stop action on this bill for a discussion of this item, and I do not do so with any idea of finding fault with the committee. I realize that this has been a very difficult subject with which to deal and that the committee has given it very long and careful consideration. I especially commend the chairman for his patient and painstaking labors on the pending bill. Nevertheless, I believe the House provision is more desirable than the Senate committee amendment.

The question of the admission of fraternal papers and publications to the mails has been one that has been before Congress a great many times. The first act regarding second-class mail matter privileges was passed in 1879, and after that act passed for a good many years fraternal papers were admitted to the mail at second-class rates without any serious question on the part of the Post Office Department until the early nineties when the Post Office Department ruled that such publications were not entitled to admission to the mails because, first, they did not have a bona fide subscription list. The question was brought up and the department ruled that a list of membership could be recognized as a list of subscribers if in the dues or initiation fees or in some other way the question of a payment for the subscription was recognized by the order.

It was also believed under the old law of 1879 that fraternal papers had the right to carry general advertising until the department ruled to the contrary. Then an act was passed in 1894, and the discussion which occurred in Congress at that time will throw a great deal of light upon the question for those who wish to know exactly what the situation then was.

It was believed then that fraternal organizations had been denied rights and benefits of the second-class mail privilege by executive orders of the Postmaster General, and so the law of 1894 was passed. It was believed at that time that the claimants for the second-class mail privilege had been accorded all they required; but after that another ruling by the department came out, in fact there were several rulings, to the effect that they still did not have a bona fide subscription list, for the roll of membership was not regarded as such a list, and that the provision regarding the advertising matter which could be published only included that which applied to the order or to the good of the order, and that the fraternal papers could not carry any advertisements except such as originated in and affected directly the order itself, as, for instance, if they had some old regalia they wished to sell they could advertise in their papers for that purpose, but could not carry any other advertising.

It ought to be understood, Mr. President, that all these fraternal associations are organized under State laws which forbid that they should be conducted for profit. Not one of these organizations can be carried on or can conduct a publication for profit alone; indeed, if it were known that that was the chief object of the advertisements the charter of the organization would be forfeited. Mr. President, I have never heard that the privilege accorded prior to 1894 and some little time thereafter has ever been abused.

Mr. BOURNE. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Very gladly.

Mr. BOURNE. Do I understand the Senator from Michigan to say that none of these organizations could charge for subscription to their papers any more than it cost the organization——

Mr. REED. Will the Senator please speak so that we can all hear him?

Mr. BOURNE. I was asking the Senator from Michigan if I understood him to say that none of these organizations could charge for subscription to their papers more than it cost the organization for the support and maintenance of the papers?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Oh, no. I was not discussing that point at all.

Mr. BOURNE. I understood the Senator to say they could not charge any profit. Probably I misunderstood him.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes. I stated that these orders could not conduct their publications for purposes of profit. They could, however, undoubtedly charge an amount for the publication which would contribute to the expenses of the publication and, incidentally, to the expenses of the order, but they could not issue a publication for the purposes of making money, under the organization or under their charters.

Mr. BOURNE. Then why do they desire the privilege of carrying advertising matter?

Mr. TOWNSEND. For the purpose I have stated. In the first place, it is a known fact that a great majority of these publications are conducted at a loss. They do not receive the amount of money that it costs the organization to publish them, and the reason they are published is because the paper furnishes a means, an easy and adequate means, for giving notices of assessments and other notices incidental to the conduct of the order.

Mr. BOURNE. If the Senator will allow me, how is the determination to be arrived at whether they are conducted at a loss or not if no charge is made to the member of the organization for the subscription to the paper?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The papers are published out of a fund, a lodge fund, drawn upon for that purpose. By reference to that fund one could determine very readily what was the expense of the publication, and the only object of the publications in getting the right to carry advertisements was to secure some means to assist them in defraying the cost of publishing the paper itself.

Mr. BOURNE. If I may interrupt the Senator from Michigan——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Any time.

Mr. BOURNE. How is the amount of the fund that is set aside for the publication of the paper determined? Upon what basis? It is autocratic, absolutely.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Absolutely.

Mr. BOURNE. How can you say, then, that there is a regular subscription price if an amount is autocratically set aside for the maintenance of the paper?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I did not wish to be understood as saying that there was an amount set aside. If I stated that, I did not mean it. I meant that a certain sum was deducted from the revenues of the order for meeting the expenses of the paper.

Mr. BOURNE. And that is charged to whom?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is charged to the general fund of the order, and paid out as a part of the running expenses of the order, the same as rent would be paid or any other fixed charge, because it has become a fixed charge upon every order which issues a paper.

These papers are in themselves of the highest character, so far as concerns the material in them.

They are contributing to the welfare of their membership. I have never seen a paper which was issued by one of these orders against which there could be the slightest objection. They go to the homes of about 8,000,000 members in the United States.

Now, what was sought by the House amendment was to make absolutely clear the fact that these papers could carry advertisements not inconsistent with the postal rules and laws and not inconsistent, of course, with the charters under which they are doing business, and this bill provides for that; the committee has left that in. It also sought to provide further that a list of members, where the order consisted of a thousand or more members, should be a sufficient subscription list for the circulation of the paper, to meet the requirements of the law. Therefore it has seemed to me that inasmuch as I have never heard any complaint of any abuse of this privilege, these worthy institutions, and I think they are all recognized as worthy, should possess this right and benefit.

I repeat that under a general order of the department for a season the department recognized that membership in this order constituted a subscription, provided in the initiation fees or the dues—it was recognized that a payment had been made or included in it.

Now, the committee has gone a long way in the right direction here, and perhaps it is technical for me to make this objection, namely, I am afraid that under this language the department may still rule that the method adopted by the orders does not square with the notion of the department as to what is a subscription list.

Mr. BOURNE. If the Senator will permit me, the committee of the Senate in considering this matter, as the Senator has stated, spent considerable time and held hearings. They have the same opinion that the Senator has so graphically described in reference to these organizations. The desire of the Senate committee was to put these fraternal organizations on the same basis that we put all publishers of other magazines, periodicals, or newspapers.

Under the law the privilege of becoming second-class mail matter depends upon a regular subscription list. There are some 26,504 publications outside of fraternal and benevolent organizations, of which there are some 1,346. That we should give privileges to or remove conditions from these 1,346 publications that are not given or required of the 26,504 was deemed by the committee as unjust and discriminatory. We have tried in the committee amendment to meet what the representatives of these associations claim they desire. No burden will be put upon the organizations or the members by compliance with the committee amendment. We adopted what is known as the Dodds bill, to which the Senator refers, as it passed the House, with the exception of the proviso, and we substituted a proviso for the House proviso.

Under the Senate proviso the only limitation or restriction put upon the members or upon the organizations is that the subscription price to members shall be not less than 50 per cent of the regular subscription price.

I understand the largest organization in the United States is the Woodmen, representing some 1,200,000. I understand that organization is composed of local lodges of a hundred members each; that members pay to their local lodges certain dues; that the head lodge receives from the subsidiary lodges twice a year a certain payment. If there are a hundred members in a lodge, twice a year, or every six months, $60 is sent by the local lodge to the parent lodge for overhead charges.

According to the committee amendment here, if adopted, all that would be required would be that a certain percentage of that $60 received by the parent lodge each six months should be applied for subscription to the papers in order to come within the requirement of the law and to entitle the publication to the privileges of second-class mail matter. There would thus be a paid subscription list, which is required of the other 26,000 papers and periodicals admitted to the mails as second-class matter.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him here, if that were clear in this amendment I should see less objection to the striking out of the House matter. But that is not the way the amendment reads. The amendment you have put in here reads that it shall be limited to those members who pay for it. It "shall be limited to copies mailed to such members as pay therefor, either as a part of their dues or assessments or otherwise."

Mr. BOURNE. "Either as a part of their dues or assessments."

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes; but you say that the part which is submitted to the grand lodge can be kept out and used as payments for the subscriptions.

Mr. BOURNE. I say, if the Senator will permit me, that according to my interpretation of this and according to the interpretation of the Third Assistant Postmaster General, if the receipts given by the grand lodge to the subsidiary lodges state that of the amount received so much or such a percentage was for subscription to the periodical and such a percentage was for dues, then the department would be obliged, under the amendment proposed by the Senate committee, to construe those members as subscribers within the law.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator think——

Mr. BOURNE. The prohibition which would be placed would be, if that amounted to 25 cents a year, for instance, or 20 cents a year, according to the apportionment that may be made for the subscription and the apportionment for dues——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). Will the Senator from Oregon kindly suspend in order that the Senate may receive a message from the House of Representatives?

Mr. BOURNE. Certainly.

CONTINUANCE OF APPROPRIATIONS—PENSION AGENCIES.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 344) to continue the provisions of a joint resolution approved July 1, 1912, entitled "Joint resolution extending appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government under certain contingencies," in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 344) to continue the provisions of a joint resolution approved July 1, 1912, entitled "Joint resolution extending appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government under certain contingencies," which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Oregon yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BOURNE. With pleasure.

Mr. WARREN. The Committee on Appropriations has already had under consideration the subject matter embraced in the joint resolution, and I suggest that the joint resolution be referred to the committee. The committee is ready to report.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Before that is done I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming whether this emergency legislation—I suppose it is so regarded—goes far enough to meet all urgent expenses, including the payment now due for pensions?

Mr. WARREN. It only goes so far as a one twenty-fourth of the appropriation of last year will take it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to know, if it is possible to obtain the information from the Senator from Wyoming, whether the failure to pass the necessary appropriation bills, which should be effective now, endangers the payment of pensions to veteran soldiers now entitled to the same under the new law?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator, first, that the due proportion for the half month—and that is what the joint resolution provides for—of course, can be had. If the conferees, which now have possession of the pension bill, would agree upon the same and report it, there would immediately become available the proceeds of that appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Under this joint resolution——

Mr. WARREN. Regardless of this joint resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Regardless of this joint resolution.

Mr. WARREN. Yes. That, in fact, would make this joint resolution unnecessary, as the Pension Department under the pension bill——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator where the difficulty lies in making appropriations to meet such expenditures as the one to which I refer?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that we could here now introduce a joint resolution to provide for that alone and send it to the other House, although it should naturally come from that end of the Capitol. But to undertake to amend this joint resolution—it is a matter I have had under consideration and so have the committee—seems impracticable, because this in a few words makes available for one-half month an amount equal in proportion to the standing regular appropriations of last year. Last month we provided for one-twelfth, and this is for one twenty-fourth.

Now, we find the Post Office Department short, the Agricultural Department short, and a number of other departments are short; but the circumstances are different in each case, so that no general proposition to cover them all is practicable, unless we make a general provision that each department shall spend what it requires—which, of course, is not practicable—or await the passage of the general supply bills.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It seems to me we are drifting into a very unfortunate situation.

Mr. WARREN. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Where the responsibility rests for a failure to make the necessary appropriations I am unable to say, but the Senator from Wyoming, I think, will agree that the Government is amply supplied with the means to meet all these charges.

Mr. WARREN. It is.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Indeed we have an excess of revenue now that is available; but the pension checks which have gone out from the bureau ever since the pension system was established, are, because of inactivity somewhere, now to be withheld from the veterans of the war, who in their old age need this monthly payment, and I should like to see the responsibility for this delay placed where it belongs. If it lies in this Chamber, I should like to know it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why are not the pensions paid?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Because there has been no appropriation made.

Mr. OVERMAN. The appropriation has been made. A joint resolution continuing the appropriations of the last fiscal year was passed 15 or 30 days ago.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The pension checks would go out to-day if the money was available.

Mr. WARREN. The pension checks go out once a quarter.

Mr. OVERMAN. Quarterly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. From official information which I received this morning from the Commissioner of Pensions, no fund is now at his disposal for this purpose.

Mr. STONE. I will say to the Senator from Michigan that the responsibility lies in this Chamber, in the fact that it did not agree to the bill passed by the House in the form in which it was sent here.

Mr. WARREN. Let me ask the Senator from Missouri to repeat his last remark. I did not catch it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will tell the Senator what the Senator from Missouri said.

Mr. WARREN. What was the last remark the Senator from Missouri made?

Mr. STONE. I said that if the Senate had agreed to the appropriation bill sent here by the House the bill would have been a law and the money would have been available.

Mr. WARREN. I presume that the Senator from Missouri thinks that that statement is true, but, unfortunately, it is incorrect. The Senate has not delayed appropriation bills. The Senator ought to know that a week or 10 days ago we passed the sundry civil bill, and notified the House by sending the bill back there that we were ready at any moment to go into conference on the bill. Still the bill has not been taken up or sent to conference, and that has been the case with other appropriation bills.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, when the District of Columbia appropriation bill went from this body with a request for a conference it was held up for two months before the conference was granted.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; and I want to say another thing to the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Michigan. This very matter which has been talked about was presented fully to the proper committee at the other end of the Capitol, and we have heard nothing from them.

Mr. STONE. This very bill which we are now considering here, which is occupying the time of the Senate, was passed by the House practically two months or more ago. So with other bills that have been passed by the House and sent over here, the Senate committees and the Senate itself have been holding them up.

Mr. WARREN. The Senate Committee on Appropriations has been ready to meet with the representatives of the House every day and every hour.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read twice and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is not my intention to delay the passage of the emergency resolution just reported, but there seems to be a wide difference of opinion between the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the Senator from Wyoming, and the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. WARREN. The record will show who is correct.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not pretend to locate the difficulty, but I do know that unless some action is taken, and taken promptly, to insure payment, the veterans of the Civil War, who are entitled to their pensions already adjudicated, will be greatly inconvenienced by the failure to receive that to which they are justly entitled, and I do not want the opportunity to pass without reminding Senators that it is not to our credit that such a condition of affairs should exist.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Senator from Michigan is mistaken about these pension warrants. I do not mean to say that he has not correctly stated to the Senate the information he has received, but I think his information itself is incorrect. I think the pension warrants were sent out on the 1st of July, and then the next payment will be October 1. So if these pension warrants for July were taken care of by virtue of the joint resolution which has heretofore been passed extending the appropriations, between now and October there will be no pension warrants to be sent out at all, because they are sent out only quarterly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I was moved to make this statement because of a statement made to me by the Commissioner of Pensions to-day—and I think I am entirely correct—that the department over which he presides is being very seriously handicapped, and the proper treatment of veterans jeopardized, by laxity and neglect on the part of Congress to make necessary appropriations.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think the Senator has been misinformed, even though his informant may have been the Commissioner of Pensions. The general appropriation for pensions for this year is substantially the same as last year, only it is a little more. We passed a joint resolution continuing the appropriations of last year for the month of July, so the departments had one-twelfth of the appropriation of last year, which was almost as much as is carried in the general pension appropriation bill for this year. Now, we propose to pass an emergency measure continuing for the present month the appropriations for one-twelfth of last year.

Mr. WARREN. It is one twenty-fourth.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is true; it is one twenty-fourth. I do not see how there can be any embarrassment on the part of the Commissioner of Pensions in paying these claims.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there is embarrassment on the part of the commisioner in paying these claims. I was informed to-day that at the end of the week there will be a deficiency of about $30,000,000. I will not call it a deficiency, because we have not made our appropriation, but there will be new claims fully adjudicated to the extent of about $30,000,000 before the end of this week, and there is not the money appropriated under the joint resolution or otherwise to pay that amount, and we ought to have some provision for making these payments.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will not the Senator agree with me that if we had passed the general pension appropriation bill a month ago or two weeks ago we would not have had this emergency?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is correct. We had a deficiency last year and the year before——

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes. We may have a larger deficiency, but it would have been cured by the passage of the general pension appropriation bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. It would have been so cured, and, Mr. President, I think it appropriate for me to state at this time the cause of the delay in passing the general appropriation bill for pensions. We have for nearly two months had the matter under consideration day in and day out, adjourning from day to day and sometimes for a few days. We have agreed upon every proposition but one, and that proposition is one that relates to general legislation; and it is the opinion of the conferees on the part of the Senate that when either House seeks to make entirely new legislation or unmake old legislation, which is exactly the same thing, upon an appropriation bill, if it is impossible for the conferees to agree, that House which asks for the repeal of the old legislation should be the one to yield in matters of that character, if it is purely new legislation and not necessarily pertinent to the appropriation bill.

We have been unable to agree upon that point. The Senate conferees have gone halfway—I think a little more than halfway—in their propositions in order to secure an agreement which would allow us to put the bill through.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is the character of this general legislation?

Mr. McCUMBER. The general legislation is to repeal the old law providing for pension agencies.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senate holds out. The reason we have no bill is because the Senate wants to keep in these agencies, the abolition of which has been recommended by the department.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; the Senator has got it wrong. The House holds out because it wants to repeal an old law, and the Senate is not willing to repeal that law.

Mr. OVERMAN. The House simply fails to make the appropriation for them; is that it?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no——

Mr. OVERMAN. The 17 pension agencies; and the bill as it came over here did not appropriate for those agencies.

Mr. McCUMBER. The proposed law is in effect a repeal, because it has other provisions which in effect repeal all that portion of the law relating to pension agencies.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that it is a repeal to the extent that it does not make the appropriation. Now, I will ask the Senator also if the abolition of these agencies has not been recommended by the department?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator from North Dakota permit me?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to say to the Senator from North Carolina that the starvation policy of another branch of Congress, which withholds support from necessary legislation in order to gratify a mistaken prejudice against a few pension agents, may operate very disadvantageously to those who are entitled to their pensions.

Mr. OVERMAN. It might be, I will say in reply to the Senator from Michigan, that a stubborn Senate would rather keep in 17 pension agents than let the old veterans have their money.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; a loyal Democrat would rather support the mistaken policy of his party in another Chamber and attempt by indirection to weed out a few appointees than pay the soldiers' pensions now due.

Mr. OVERMAN. Another party, your party, and the Democratic Party, to which I have the honor to belong, both have agreed to this policy recommended by your administration.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, no, Mr. President. I do not think the Senator from North Carolina is correct. I know of no agreement in this Chamber or among Senators or anywhere else to put on an appropriation bill legislation of this character.

Mr. OVERMAN. The House just failed to make the appropriation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; they failed to make the appropriation. It is an old policy; if they are unable to accomplish their purpose directly they choose this method of strangulation.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does not the Senator know——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It has been done before. It has been done by the Democratic majority before.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am told that in the House of Representatives there were only 17 votes against this policy.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There is singular unanimity over there when it comes to official reform, they are even willing to withhold pensions from deserving soldiers in their old age, a form of contempt sometimes shown upon other fields of controversy, and I hope that kind of policy will never be approved in this Chamber.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there is a simple way out of this proposition. If there are only 17 Members in the whole House against the proposition of continuing these agencies, it will probably not take them 17 minutes to put through a bill of that character, and if a bill of that character comes before the Senate and is referred to the Committee on Pensions, I think I can guarantee that it will not take 17 minutes more for that committee to report the bill into the Senate and allow the Senate to act upon it. It is a matter purely of changing our old law, and is not necessarily a proper matter for an appropriation bill, pure and simple.

I would say, let us pass the appropriation bill for this year, and then, if we want to change our law to take effect at any time, let is be done under the general bill, not attached to an appropriation bill; and you can make it take effect immediately or take effect at any time in the future. You will then, if you pass it, cut off so much of the appropriation as has been made for that specific purpose. There is nothing to be gained that I can see in insisting that this bill relating to pension agencies should necessarily be attached to the appropriation bill.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. STONE. The old soldiers are entitled to the sympathy of the people and the aid of the Government. They are living along in the shadow of what is the final sunset of life. The House of Representatives, recognizing the duty and the obligation of the Government in their behalf, has passed a bill making appropriations to pay the deserved pensions to these old veterans. But the passage of that law is obstructed and held in abeyance here in the Senate by what and why? As I understand the situation and the facts, the House put into this bill a provision dispensing with a number of superfluous officeholders. Perhaps it would be more accurate to say that it failed to make provision for the continuance of a number of high-paid officials burdening the pay roll of the Government, not soldiers, but civilian appointees. My friend from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] says to me that some are soldiers. Possibly that may be so, but for the most part they are men who were never upon a field of battle nor in the hearing of the sound of war. They have been appointed from different States as a part of the official patronage of those who had influence with the Government, holding these places and drawing large salaries, said to be useless places, not necessary to the efficient discharge of the duties of the department.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Just a moment and I will yield to the Senator. As I understand the facts to be, the department itself has said that these officials can be well dispensed with, without injury to the public service, saving thousands and tens of thousands of dollars to the Treasury. Yet the old soldiers are held at arm's length waiting for their pensions upon a contention made by the Senate that these official favorites, pensioners themselves on the Public Treasury, shall be kept in their places.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator yield to me now?

Mr. STONE. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will leave the matter as to the discussion of the pension agencies to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the chairman of the committee; but I know the Senator from Missouri wants to be accurate. When the Senator from Missouri says these pension agents are not as a rule old soldiers he is incorrectly informed. We have three pension agencies in New England, and the agent in each case is a soldier of great distinction. They are men who served long and faithfully and gallantly.

Mr. CULLOM. In Illinois he is an old soldier.

Mr. GALLINGER. In Illinois he is an old soldier; and I think, as a rule, they are old soldiers. There may be exceptions, but the Senator made the statement quite too broad on that point.

Mr. STONE. I did, perhaps, in the first instance, but I modified it, saying on the authority of my friend the senior Senator from Michigan, that there are among these agents some old soldiers.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the rule is that they are old soldiers. There may be some civilians.

Mr. STONE. But if they were all old soldiers, I do not see that it would change the absolute question before the Senate and before the country. If they are old soldiers, deserving pensions, they are drawing them, and in order to maintain them in official place, with an additional salary, hundreds of thousands of others who have no places of that kind should not be kept out of their rights.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, let us get at the truth of this matter. The Senator from Missouri says that the House passed an appropriation bill and the Senate has been holding up that appropriation bill. Nothing could be further from the truth. The House passed an appropriation bill and they attached to that appropriation bill another matter, which repealed a law upon our statute books. The Senate immediately took up that appropriation bill, and in due and proper time passed the appropriation bill. So the Senate passed the bill appropriating money for the pensions to be paid out during the fiscal year from July 1, 1912, to June 30, 1913. They passed that some two months ago, I think.

That bill went back to the House. The House practically says by its action, We will not agree to an appropriation bill pure and simple. We will insist upon a rider, which affects general legislation and repeals an old law, and we will starve you into submission. We reply, Let the old law take its course and let any law to repeal it take its chances before the two Houses. We are perfectly willing to do that, but let us appropriate the money to pay the old soldiers now and let us deal with this question of general legislation, or the repeal of any other legislation, in a separate bill.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. In just one moment. The two Houses disagree upon the question whether or not the pension agencies should be disposed of. Let us lay that aside and let us go ahead and provide an appropriation for carrying out the law as it now exists. That is what the Senate offers to do. The House fails to do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. BRYAN. I know the Senator from North Dakota desires to be accurate. I do not think he is exactly accurate in his statement that the House added new legislation on the bill and the Senate struck it off.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me——

Mr. BRYAN. My recollection is that the bill as it came to the Senate and to the Senate committee was an appropriation bill pure and simple; that it did not provide for the payment of expenses to keep in operation 17 pension agencies outside of the main office at Washington, and that the Senate committee added a sufficient appropriation to keep those 17 pension agencies in existence, notwithstanding the fact that only the 17 Congressmen from the districts affected voted against the House bill as it passed, and notwithstanding the fact that the Commissioner of Pensions and the President of the United States recommended that those 17 useless agencies be abolished.

So I hardly think it is fair, Mr. President, to say that the Senate committee offered to put it back into the shape of an appropriation bill. It was nothing but an appropriation bill when it came to the Senate. The House has a right to refuse to continue those 17 pension agencies if it desires to do so. It was an amendment of the Senate put on in committee and adopted in the Senate that has caused whatever delay has existed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, any provision in a bill which repeals an old law is new legislation. It changes the law. The present law provides for 18 agencies.

Mr BRYAN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Any law which abolishes those agencies, directly or indirectly, changes that law, and a refusal to appropriate——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. McCUMBER. In just one moment. A refusal to appropriate for the places is the equivalent of abolishing them. But the House did not stop there. It not only refused to appropriate for those agencies, but it provided specially for the transfer of the records of those agencies from the several points where they are located to the city of Washington, and thereby completed the annihilation of those agencies.

Now, that is a new proposition. We differ on whether it would be for the interest of the Government to abolish those agencies. With a fair difference the Senate conferees have offered to recommend in this bill an investigation by the executive department into the necessity for continuing those agencies, and if the executive department reports after an investigation that an economical and efficient administration of the Government will justify the abolition of those agencies, the President will be directed and authorized to abolish them.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. We have gone that far, and we stand ready to recommend to the Senate the adoption of that proposition. If it is established to the satisfaction of the Interior Department and the President to-day, or the President who may be our President next year, that we should not continue those agencies, he would have the authority under the Senate proposition to abolish them. We have gone that far, and I insist that the House ought in good faith to take that proposition off the bill and let us proceed to make the appropriations necessary to pay the soldiers what may be their due the next quarterly pay day.

I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, regardless of the question whether the Senate added new legislation or not, is it not true that the simple fact remains that the only thing keeping this appropriation bill in conference is that the Senate conferees stand for continuing the 17 pension agencies that the President and the Commissioner of Pensions have already recommended should be abolished?

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator when and where has the Commissioner of Pensions recommended that these pension agencies should be abolished?

Mr. BRYAN. The Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. McCUMBER. When?

Mr. BRYAN. In the report last year.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to see the report.

Mr. BRYAN. I have it not here.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator is mistaken. I think he will find no recommendation of that character. The commissioner has not made a recommendation one way or the other.

Mr. BRYAN. Regardless of that, that is the only matter in difference that is keeping the bill in conference, is it not?

Mr. McCUMBER. All that has been done is the testimony taken before the committee some two years ago, and no recommendation has been made by the Secretary of the Interior, by the President, or by any Commissioner of Pensions. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. BRYAN. I will ask the Senator this question, then: If the Senate conferees will agree to the abolishment of these 17 pension agencies, is there anything to keep this appropriation bill in conference?

Mr. McCUMBER. I suppose if the House would attach any other legislation upon the bill and ask the Senate to agree to it, and the Senate would agree to changing some other law, they might secure the appropriation.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the Senator answer the question I asked him?

Mr. McCUMBER. As has been suggested to me, we might pass all the appropriation bills in a very short time if we would yield everything.

Mr. BRYAN. Is there anything else keeping the pension appropriation bill in conference except the refusal of the Senate conferees to resist the amendment and keep the 17 pension agencies in force?

Mr. McCUMBER. Is it anything except the refusal of the House conferees to leave out of the bill legislation that does not necessarily belong to it?

Mr. BRYAN. What legislation is the House trying to keep in the bill?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think we have been talking about that legislation for a great while.

Mr. BRYAN. The House wants to take away the appropriation to maintain the 17 pension agencies that are said to be useless.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let us put it in clear and concise English. The House desires to abolish the agencies.

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senate by its vote desires to retain those agencies, and that is the issue.

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is all there is.

Mr. WARREN. If Congress carries out the law in making appropriation in the regular way in the appropriation bill it would provide for those agencies, would it not?

Mr. McCUMBER. We now have the law on our statute books. It is a question whether we will appropriate to carry out that law or whether we shall change that law.

I submit that when there is an insistent and a grave difference between the two Houses upon an appropriation bill the House which seeks to interject legislation which abolishes or repeals older legislation it should be allowed to come up as a distinct matter and not upon the appropriation bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I concur in the view of the Senator from North Dakota that the situation is a most grave one, the gravest imaginable that could be put up to Republican conferees at this time. The proposition to abolish offices held by Republicans at this time is not only grave, but it is tragic.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. BRYAN. Will the Senator from Wyoming allow me to suggest one word further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. BRYAN. I will state for what it is worth, that I understand from the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY], who has been on the Pension Committee for a number of years, that 3 of these agencies were established by statute and the other 14 were established in pursuance of Executive order.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, so much the less reason for one of the branches of Congress insisting upon putting into a positive law that which the President has a right to do without any law. If the President, without any law upon the statute books, can abolish 14 out of 17 or 15 out of 18 agencies, then there is no crying necessity for a law upon this subject. The fact that the President has not done so is some argument, and convincing possibly to some of us, that the change ought not to be made.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield further to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. BRYAN. If the House refuses to give money to the executive department to keep in existence the establishment of them, would it not amount to the abolishment?

Mr. WARREN. As I have stated, this legislation is hardly such that it can be now safely amended, because it must reach and secure the signature of the President to-day. I desire to say, with reference to all that has been said as to appropriations for pensions, that the Treasury has plenty of money to pay pensions when they are due, and, so far as I am concerned—and I believe the Senate Committee on Appropriations feels the same way—we are ready to pay that money out as fast as it falls due in the proper way.

I now report from the Committee on Appropriations the House joint resolution No. 344 and ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 344) to continue the provisions of the joint resolution approved July 1, 1912, entitled "Joint resolution extending appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government under certain contingencies," was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the provisions of a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution extending appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government under certain contingencies," approved July 1, 1912, shall be extended and continued in full force and effect for and during the first half of the month of August, 1912.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21279) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I should be very much better pleased with the House provision than with any of the suggestions which have been made. Nevertheless, I realize that this is a question about which there is a great difference of opinion. I am as anxious as the chairman or any other Member to harmonize our differences and get at the thing we all believe is just and equitable. I understand that the suggestion has been made for an amendment here. If the chairman has it, I would be glad to have it stated.

Mr. BOURNE. I will send to the desk an amendment to be proposed in the first line on page 37 of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment to the amendment for information.

Mr. BOURNE. I think it will eliminate any uncertainty the Senator from Michigan seems to think there might be in the proposed committee amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 37, line 1, after the words "sample copies," insert:

Provided further, That subscriptions by the respective lodges of the aforesaid fraternal societies, unions, and organizations in behalf of their bona fide paying members and receipts to the lodges for their members shall be evidence of subscription and payment, and individual subscriptions and receipts shall not be required.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I recognize the principle that is intended to be carried by those words, but it seems to me that the word "lodges" is hardly a sufficiently comprehensive word to cover literary societies, labor unions, and the other orders which are hoping to receive a benefit under this particular provision.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. JONES. I should like to know what is meant by bona fide paying members. Does it mean subscription-paying members or dues-paying members, or what?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I take it what is meant there is dues-paying members.

Mr. JONES. All the members are dues-paying members, or they are supposed to be. Does it mean subscription to their local paper? It seems to me that that is very indefinite in itself.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The object of putting in bona fide members there is to obviate the possibility of papers being issued to be circulated at a nominal price or for a special and limited purpose rather than for the enduring purposes of the orders themselves.

Mr. JONES. I appreciate what the object is; but it does not seem to me that the language covers the object sought to be attained.

Mr. BOURNE. The purpose of the language in the amendment just sent to the desk is to prevent any members of societies who may make no payment whatever or pay any dues of any nature from being entitled to the privileges under the proviso should it be adopted; that they have to be bona fide paying members of their societies. Then, with the provision which precedes, it would enable the subscriptions paid to a subsidiary unit of the main or parent society to be considered as a subscription to their papers under this authorization.

Mr. JONES. If the Senator will permit me, suppose the society members pay 5 cents or 10 cents dues, would that be a bona fide paying membership for a paper that they might issue?

Mr. BOURNE. I should so imagine, yet under this provision——

Mr. JONES. In other words, a bona fide paying member means a member who pays dues?

Mr. BOURNE. Who pays dues in the organization.

Mr. JONES. Dues paid to the organization not as a subscription to a paper?

Mr. BOURNE. Not as a subscription to a paper, except that part of his dues would be a subscription to the paper.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BOURNE. With pleasure.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire why a publication of this kind should not conform to the same rules as all other publications in regard to subscriptions and advertising? This is not a benevolent publication. If it were a benevolent publication, there is not any reason why the rules that apply to second-class matter should not apply to it. Practically all these publications are printed by members of the society for profit, and the profits from the publications go into the pockets of the publishers.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the Senator suggest some such publication that comes under this head?

Mr. BRISTOW. I know a number of them. I have known in the past—I do not know that that is so now—where controversies have arisen in a State organization as to who should have the publication of the paper, because of the profits derived from its publication. The society pays the publisher for a certain subscription list on account of its members.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, so far as fraternal organizations are concerned I do not think there is a single organization in the United States that publishes a paper for profit; that is, publishes it because of the profit that might come from the paper itself. These papers are published as a part of the operations of the society itself, for the purpose of notifying members of dues that are to be paid, of special assessments levied, and of other matters of business pertaining to the operation of the societies themselves.

The Senator from New York has suggested an amendment which obviates the objections which I have just made to the proposed amendment. I will state it. It is as follows:

And provided further, That subscriptions by the respective lodges or local organizations of the aforesaid fraternal societies, unions, and organizations—

I think perhaps the word "organizations" there should be changed to "orders," because that is the word used in the bill itself—in behalf of their bona fide paying members, and receipts for the lodges or local organizations for their members shall be evidence of subscription and payment, and individual subscriptions and receipts shall not be required.

I think that does overcome the objection which I made to the use of the term "lodges" as applied to all these societies.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan must admit that that legislation is special legislation, exempting from the rules governing the admission of second-class matter these publications.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. ROOT. May I make a suggestion? If I thought the proposed amendment of the Senate committee, with the modification that is now suggested, did work that result, I should be against it. It does not seem to me that it does. It seems to me that it merely aims to accommodate the machinery of the law to the organization of the fraternal societies and other similar organizations.

There is a central organization by which the publication is issued and which transacts a large amount of the business necessary for the conduct of the affairs of the society; but that central organization deals not with the individual members but with the local lodges or organizations, and it is to accommodate the working of the machinery of the law to that organization that I understand this amendment has been proposed by the Senate committee. In every case the individual member of the local lodge or organization pays his subscription for the journal or publication of the society. That subscription is paid to the local organization, and the receipt for it from the local organization goes to the individual member. The purpose of this amendment is to provide that the amount included in that subscription for the journal shall be a fixed proportion—at least 50 per cent—of the general subscription price so as to assimilate these publications to all other second-class mail matter, and to relieve these organizations from the necessity of having the central office deal directly with the individual members of the lodges, enabling the central office to take subscriptions for and give receipts to the local organization instead of to the individuals. I think it leaves publications of this character, as a matter of substance, in the same position as is other second-class mail matter.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, if the Senator will provide in the bill for the system which he has just described, I will certainly offer no objection to it; but the provisions as suggested do not require the member of the local organization to say, to take an illustration, "I pay my dues, $5, for the year, 50 cents or 25 cents of which shall be for the Sprig of Myrtle and the remainder for regular dues." If such a provision is incorporated, and the local member says that he wants a part of his dues to be applied to his subscription to the society paper, then I say that is all right, but this provision does not do that.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, my understanding is that he can not help it; that the members of such associations are required to pay so much a year—say $5, and the dues, by the rules of the association, cover the subscription to the society journal.

Mr. BRISTOW. But suppose he does not want the journal?

Mr. ROOT. He can not help it; he can not be a member of the association without paying for it.

Mr. BRISTOW. But he does not have to take it. Certainly it is not proposed to enact legislation to compel him to take it, if he does not want it.

Mr. ROOT. I assume, Mr. President, that when a man becomes a member of one of these associations he becomes a member under the rules of the association. I belong to some associations in which I pay so much a year and my payment covers subscription to the journal issued. I can throw it into the waste-paper basket, if I so desire, when it is received; but every payment certainly is made under the rules of the association, and under those rules the payment includes a subscription for that publication; and I can not help it, except by severing my connection with the association.

Mr. WORKS. Did the Senator know that that was a part of the rules?

Mr. BRISTOW. Will Senators advocate such legislation as that and then complain about burdening the mails with second-class matter at a great loss? Will they force upon men publications which they may not want, give those publications special privileges under the rules governing second-class mail matter, and then say that we ought to raise the second-class rate because the mails are burdened too much with second-class matter?

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from New York if he knows, as a matter of fact, that the rules to which he has referred do require a member of the association to take the society's journal and make payment for it.

Mr. ROOT. This legislation contemplates precisely that situation.

Mr. WORKS. But I understood the Senator from New York to say that the rules of the organization require members to take the journal.

Mr. ROOT. The rules of the organizations to which I referred, of several of which I am a member, do require the payment of so much money, which includes, among other things, payment for the journal, and I can not belong to the association without paying that money for the journal.

Mr. WORKS. Of course, if that be so, we can legislate with respect to that condition of things. I only wanted to know whether or not that was the fact.

Mr. ROOT. Here is the Senate committee amendment:

Provided, That the circulation through the mails of periodical publications issued by, or under the auspices of, benevolent or fraternal societies or orders, or trades-unions, or by strictly professional, literary, historical, or scientific societies, as second-class mail matter, shall be limited to copies mailed to such members as pay therefor, either as a part of their dues or assessments, or otherwise, not less than 50 per cent of the regular subscription price.

And so forth.

Mr. BOURNE. I should like to ask the Senator from New York a question. He certainly does not advocate legislating according to the rules, regulations, and by-laws of fraternal organizations, but that the by-laws, rules, and regulations of such organizations must conform to legislation enacted by Congress?

Mr. ROOT. Of course.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, I will ask the Secretary to insert in the proposed amendment I have sent to the desk, after the word "lodges," the second word in the second line, the words "or local organizations"; then strike out "organizations," the second word in the third line, and substitute in lieu thereof the word "orders"; and after the word "lodges," the fifth word in the fourth line, insert "or local organizations." I ask the Secretary to read the amendment with the changes I have just suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read as requested.

The SECRETARY. On page 37, line 1, after the word "copies," at the end of the committee amendment, it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

And provided further, That subscriptions by the respective lodges or local organizations of the aforesaid fraternal societies, unions, and orders in behalf of their bona fide paying members and receipts to the lodges or local organizations for their members shall be evidence of subscription and payment, and individual subscriptions and receipts shall not be required.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. JONES. I desire to ask the Senator from Oregon why that does not make this proposed amendment practically the same as the House provision? If so, why complicate it with all these different suggestions? Why not adopt the House provision?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I think I can answer the Senator. Some of these publications are used exclusively for advertising purposes; they do not go to members at all. They have not a pretense of a list of subscribers, and they are not circulated as the result of subscribers' dues or as the result of payment, but are sent or not sent at the option of the organization. They are used largely to be sent into territory ahead of agents who go to seek memberships. They in no sense fall within the class that would justify their being accorded the second-class mail privilege. The real effort of the committee was to limit the advantage of second-class rates to those organizations which send out their publications to their membership as part of their subscription dues or send them to them by straight subscription.

Mr. JONES. I understood from the Senator from Oregon that the publications to which the Senator from Georgia has referred are now excluded by law?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think they will be by the House provision, though they have been heretofore. I think the House provision is broad enough to let them also come under this system.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator think it is broad enough to repeal the law of 1879 in that respect?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; we thought that it was broad enough to do so. It allows them all the second-class mail privilege.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not so consider it, because the bill expressly provides that papers issued for advertising purposes only can not be admitted to the mails as second-class matter; but I quite agree with the Senator that if there is any doubt about that proposition, it ought to be resolved.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What we are proposing to exclude is not what the bill refers to as publications solely for advertising purposes. That refers to publications filled with advertisements and distributed for advertising purposes. These are lodge papers sent out in many instances without paid advertisements to advertise the order, but not sent to members. We felt that that kind of publication ought not to go on the same basis as other publications with bona fide subscribers. We thought we had worked out a plan that would broadly protect all of the real subscribers, including lodge members who obtained their papers through payment of dues to the lodges, and we were seeking to avoid the other class.

Mr. REED. Just a word, Mr. President, with reference to this matter. I think the amendment which is proposed obviates the difficulty which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] thinks exists in the House provision. I hope that the amendment or at least a similar proposition will be adopted. I confess that I have no sympathy with an effort to hamper fraternal and benevolent societies and organizations in their effort to extend their membership and influence.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BOURNE. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to ask him if he has seen any evidence on the part of the committee or in the amendment to try to hamper these societies in their efforts toward expansion?

Mr. REED. I exculpate the Senator from criticism. I had no thought of criticizing him. His conduct in this matter is beyond criticism, and my regard for him is such that I would not criticize him even if I thought he deserved it. [Laughter.] There has been, however, a disposition to deny organizations of the character referred to in the bill the opportunity to reach their membership through periodicals published by the societies. Of course, we all understand that if an organization is not a good-faith organization, if it is a mere paper concern, maintained for the purpose of defeating the object of the law, then, like any other fraud, it ought to be excluded from the benefits of the law; but it does seem to me that the National Government can well afford to treat with generosity the class of organizations referred to in this bill. They do not exist for pecuniary profit; they are organized for the purpose of promoting morals, patriotism, and education. I say, without qualification, that, next to the church itself, these societies are conservators of morals and that their work has been universally for the benefit of mankind.

In order to propagate their work, they find it necessary to publish papers which circulate among the members and advise the membership with reference to the progress of the order, the questions that interest the order, and, generally, with regard to questions of morals and even of religion. Organizations of that kind existing in good faith ought to have the right to send their papers through the mails certainly upon as favorable a basis as newspapers, which are printed and published for profit, and I trust that the legislation to be enacted here to-day will remove from the path of those societies the obstacles that have been placed there by what I have always regarded as purely arbitrary rulings by the Post Office Department.

I think that originally the Post Office Department aimed to reach periodicals that were simply money-making devices and were devoted to advertising schemes alone; but in laying down their rule they made a rule so broad that when they came to apply it, it included a class of publications which do much good in the country. There can be no question, speaking of the proposition in the large sense, that these papers are necessary to the organizations, and that the organizations themselves tend to build up homes, to improve society, to purify morals, and to teach the doctrines of humanity; and the Senate of the United States can not afford to put itself on record as opposing that class of publications and burdening them as ordinary financial schemes—I will qualify that term and say as ordinary financial ventures—in the shape of ordinary newspapers are not burdened.

I believe we ought to pursue a broad policy with regard to all means of communicating thought to our people; that the Post Office Department ought to be maintained so that every periodical of every kind that conveys useful information to the people and is devoted to decent and proper objects ought to be carried to the people as cheaply as it possibly can.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I desire to say, in regard to fraternal publications, I believe they should have the same rights and privileges accorded to other publications; that there should not be the restrictions that have been heretofore imposed upon them; but I do not believe the bars ought to be thrown down and the opportunity given for papers to be published under the auspices of organizations which are practically of no consequence, which take advantage of this privilege in order to circulate through the mails purely advertising matter. The Post Office Department for many years has been struggling to eliminate from second-class mail many publications which are not legitimate newspapers or literary publications, but are circulated in order to carry advertising of various kinds and are purely advertising sheets.

There have been built up in certain centers many publications of enormous circulation without a genuine subscription list, sent miscellaneously through the mails over the country. At times they have circulated by the million. I now have in mind a publication that employed one girl at $8 a week as the entire editorial force, and the circulation of that alleged magazine was more than 1,000,000 copies per week. Carloads of them have been carried through the mails. If we open this door wide enough so that any alleged society may be organized and be entitled to the privileges of second-class matter for its publication, the same abuses which formerly existed and which the department has been trying to correct will be aggravated. My purpose is to protect the mails against this improper use of the second-class privilege. The chairman of the committee thinks that the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] will work that result; I doubt it very much; but I am willing to accept his judgment as to the matter, because he has given it more detailed attention than I have. I regret that the amendment as it came from the committee could not stand unamended, because I think it amply protected legitimate publications, as well as protecting the mails from illegitimate publications.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, the only object of the suggestion that I made was to reconcile the difference which seemed to imperil the amendment as reported by the committee, to which I am quite ready to agree. I thought the difference could be reconciled by the addition of the few words I have suggested without imperiling the efficacy of the committee amendment. I had no other interest in it, and I care nothing further about it.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, before a vote is taken on this amendment I should like to be advised by its proponent, the chairman of the committee, exactly what the difference is in legal effect between the language contained in the bill as it came from the other House and the language contained in the amendment now pending. The proviso in the bill as it came from the other House is in this language:

Provided, That the circulation through the mails of periodical publications, issued by or under the auspices of benevolent or fraternal societies or orders or trades unions, or by strictly professional, literary, historical, or scientific societies, as second-class matter, shall be limited to copies mailed.

I stop there, for up to that point the language of the amendment proposed to the bill as it appears here is identical with the text of the House bill; but the House bill proceeds to say:

Shall be limited to copies mailed to members—

Now—

exchanges, and bona fide subscribers, together with 10 per cent of such circulation in addition as sample copies.

The Senate committee amendment provides:

Shall be limited to copies mailed to such members as pay therefor, either as a part of their dues or assessments, or otherwise, not less than 50 per cent of the regular subscription price.

Then follows, both in the text of the House bill and in the amendment, substantially the same provision having reference to the mailing of sample copies; the House provision being that they may mail 10 per cent of such circulation in addition to what preceded as sample copies. The amendment is, to be mailed "to exchanges, and 10 per cent of such circulation as sample copies."

Now, the real difference between the two is that if the amendment is agreed to instead of allowing admission to the mails of a class of journals described, there would be a limitation upon the admission that 50 per cent of the standard price of the journal shall be paid.

Mr. BOURNE. By the member.

Mr. STONE. Is that correct?

Mr. BOURNE. The Senator from Missouri has answered his own question in the presentation he has made. The only difference between the proposed Senate amendment and the way the proviso was in the House bill is that there is inserted the requirement "to such members as pay therefor, either as a part of their dues or assessments or otherwise, not less than 50 per cent of the regular subscription price" charged to outsiders; that there shall be a constructive charge to the member from his dues or an apportionment of the total amount he pays to the society.

Mr. STONE. Under the House bill what would be the right of a publisher to send the publication to the members of his organization?

Mr. BOURNE. He would be entitled under the House bill to second-class privileges in sending to all members without any requirement that he should be a subscriber or in any way other than be a member of the organization.

Mr. STONE. Under the proposed amendment the publisher could not send—I am asking the Senator if this is correct—his publication to a member of the society who has not paid 50 per cent of the subscription price of the publication either in cash or in the way of dues?

Mr. BOURNE. Or in the apportionment of dues.

Mr. STONE. Is that correct?

Mr. BOURNE. That would be my understanding of it.

Mr. STONE. Now, how will the Post Office Department know whether A or B, to whom one of these publications is sent, has paid the 50 per cent or more of the published price of the journal?

Mr. BOURNE. By the receipt given for the payment of the dues, which specifies that a certain proportion of the amount was for the subscription to the paper and the other proportion was for the dues.

Mr. STONE. How is that account to be kept? How could it be kept? By whom is it to be kept? And to whom is the account to be reported?

Mr. BOURNE. The account would be kept in the manner in which they are usually kept, showing the amount of the revenue received; and it would simply require an additional account, showing that such an amount was allotted to the organization journal, whatever it may be.

Mr. STONE. It would require some official to keep that particular account?

Mr. BOURNE. Not at all, that I can see.

Mr. STONE. Is such an account kept now?

Mr. BOURNE. There would be a difference in the receipt. The receipt itself would say, "$1.25 received; 10 cents for the journal and $1.15 for dues."

Mr. STONE. The Senator means to say the receipt of the subscriber would show that?

Mr. BOURNE. Yes.

Mr. STONE. That is in his pocket.

Mr. BOURNE. The books of the organization will show as to the other.

Mr. STONE. Then is the organization required to make some report to the Post Office Department?

Mr. BOURNE. If called upon. It is not provided for here in the proposed amendment.

Mr. STONE. How then will the Post Office Department know that it has been paid?

Mr. BOURNE. In exactly the same way that is done with the number of bona fide subscribers required for newspapers and magazines to entitle them to the privileges of second-class mail matter; and if an organization were sending out its paper and the Postmaster General had any question in reference to whether it was admissible to second-class privileges under the law, I assume, under the operation of the committee amendment, if adopted, the production of the books of the organization showing it had received so much money, part being for dues and part of it being for subscription for the paper, would comply with the provisions of the proposed amendment.

Mr. STONE. I desire to say just a word or two, and I ask my friend, who has been giving the subject his attention, to hear what I say.

Mr. BOURNE. With great pleasure.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am as much opposed as anybody to imposing upon the appropriations for the postal service, allowing men to take advantage of opportunities. The truth is I think a great number of publications are abusing the privilege.

Mr. BOURNE. A great many are abusive of it.

Mr. STONE. As to their being abusive I have nothing to say. But what I do say is that I have myself—and so have all Senators and most everyone else—seen publications that are filled almost wholly with advertising, with a little reading matter between the advertisements, and reading matter of no great public value. Thousands are sent out. I think this might well be made the subject of investigation. But here are publications issued by societies engaged in different lines of work, but all work of a great public value—some charitable, some scientific, some one thing and some another, but all of great public value.

Now, I have talked with some gentlemen who are interested in these publications, and I have been impressed with this view: That so far there has been no abuse of the postal privilege; no abuse of the right of sending their publications through the mail. I do not believe there has been, so far as I have been able to see, and yet they have been going on for a long time—for many years. Is it not a fact that you are about, by this amendment, to impose an additional and, so far as experience goes, an unnecessary burden upon the societies engaged in caring for their membership, the widows and the orphans, societies eleemosynary in their nature, engaged in spreading very valuable educational information?

What is the need of it? Why should not this thing go on as it has been going on, without imposing an additional burden upon this most deserving class, which in no instance, so far as I am advised, has abused the privileges?

I know the Senator from Oregon and the Senator who offered this amendment had no thought of this kind in mind, but if the effect is to require these societies to expend a considerable sum of money in keeping these accounts, in making these official reports——

Mr. BOURNE. No reports are called for under the bill, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. STONE. Then, if they are not called for, what is the use of this provision?

Mr. BOURNE. They can be asked for; but I say they are not called for specifically.

Mr. STONE. They are not called for specifically by the very letter of the bill; but if power is put in the hands of the Post Office Department, which is urging the passage of this law, as I understand and have been informed, and if we place it within their jurisdiction to do these things, it is to be presumed that they will not allow this law to stand on the statute books as a dead letter.

They will undertake to enforce it in some way, and that means administrative methods to which these societies will be put in doing things they have not been required to do in the past, and, so far as their conduct in the past is concerned, nothing has been done to warrant any drastic legislation against them.

Mr. BOURNE. I will state that the effort on the part of the committee is simply to put all second-class mail matter on the same footing.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will pardon me, I should like to know what the abuse is, what the evil is, that he seeks to remedy by this legislation. Has there been any abuse; is there any known evil that he seeks to correct by this legislation? If there has been, what is it?

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that there is no effort or attempt to correct any abuse, so far as these societies or organizations are concerned. The effort on the part of the committee in offering the amendment is to prevent an injustice against that twenty-six thousand and odd papers and periodicals that come under the second-class privilege, which are required to have a bona fide subscription in order to make them eligible to that privilege, for which service, according to the data presented by the department, the Government receives 1 cent a pound, while the service costs the Government over 8 cents a pound, making a loss of millions of dollars to the Government, which, it is believed by some, is compensated for in the educational value of the literature.

I think all the committee recognize fully the benefits of these orders. I think they are all friendly to them. Speaking for myself, I believe that the Dodds bill as it came from the House was class legislation, and the purpose was to rectify that and to meet, as nearly as possible, the request of the representatives of the fraternal organizations, and without doing an injustice to another class of our citizens. That was the sole purpose of the committee amendment, as I understand.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not believe I fully understand this matter, and while I am very sorry to prolong the discussion, there is a little information I want from somebody who has it. I will ask the chairman of the committee for it.

Is it true that under the existing law these publications with advertisements in them can not be circulated through the mails as second-class matter?

Mr. BOURNE. I will say in reply to the inquiry of the Senator from Iowa, my understanding is that under the existing law these periodicals and papers of these societies can not carry advertising matter and enjoy the privileges of second-class mail matter.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. The purpose, then, of the bill, among other things, is to give to these publications the right to circulate or be sent through the mails as second-class matter with advertising in them.

Mr. BOURNE. With advertising privileges.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that all the members of the committee desire to extend to the associations or societies that privilege. I take it that is so, because there is no dissent from that general proposition in the bill.

Mr. BOURNE. If the Senator will permit me, I think his manner of presentation might possibly be misleading. The purpose of the committee is to require of the papers of these organizations that they shall have a bona fide subscription list, the same as other periodicals and newspapers enjoying the privileges of the second-class mail.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not come to that. But the chief purpose of the change in the law that is proposed here is to extend to these publications a privilege which they do not now enjoy, and then other conditions seem to accompany the bill for the purpose of protecting the Government against an abuse of a privilege which is now for the first time extended.

I will not ask the Senator, the chairman of the committee, to answer the question last put, because it is rather argumentative in its form, and I think it is fully answered by the former reply; but I want to ask him one further question. Under existing law these publications, if they do not contain advertising matter, pass through the mails as second-class matter without the ceremony of individual subscriptions or individual receipts, do they not?

Mr. BOURNE. That is my understanding—that under the law of July 16, 1894, they were given this privilege, but were prohibited from carrying advertising matter and relieved of the requirements of a subscription list.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why is it any more necessary to legislate with regard to subscriptions and how they shall be made, whether through the lodges or the chief societies, or otherwise, after we have given them the privilege of carrying advertising matter, than it was before they had that privilege?

Mr. BOURNE. We have not given them the privilege of carrying advertising matter. That is the privilege they seek.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know.

Mr. BOURNE. And they want to come in with the 26,500 other papers of whom we require a bona fide subscription list, and they ask to be relieved of that.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the law now requires bona fide subscription lists. There is no law relating to fraternal society publications, so far as their subscription lists are concerned, that does not apply to every other publication in the land.

Mr. BOURNE. According to my understanding, the act of July 16, 1894, gave the publications of benevolent and fraternal organizations admission to the privilege of second-class mail matter, prohibited them from carrying advertising matter, and relieved them of any requirement of a subscription list, and in my opinion the legislation of 1894 was class legislation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Oregon knows better than I, but I did not remember at least that the law of 1894 did relieve them of the necessity of having a subscription list.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The law of 1894 did make the provision to which the Senator refers, from which I think he draws a very improper conclusion. These are the words, if the Senator will permit me:

Provided further, That such matter shall be originated and published to further the objects and purposes of the society, trades-union, etc.

Nothing was said in that law about advertising, and the department held that advertising was a matter of construction by the department.

Mr. CUMMINS. I so understood. But I ask the Senator whether there is anything in the law of 1894 with respect to the manner in which subscriptions shall be made or the evidences of those subscriptions?

Mr. TOWNSEND. There is not.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is my recollection.

I applaud very highly the purpose of the committee. I believe it has recognized what most people in this country understand to be a wise and high public policy, but what I can not understand is, when this privilege is extended with regard to advertising matter which was denied to these publications under the law of 1894 as construed by the Post Office Department, the necessity of so scrupulously guarding the subscriptions; and I can not see why the practice of the department now enforced with regard to the subscriptions of these papers, when without advertising, should not be continued as to those papers when they contain advertising matter. I have not been able to see any difference between the two cases.

I was not able in the hasty reading of it to understand fully the amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Michigan. I should like to have the Secretary again read the proposed amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 37, line 1, after the word "copies," it is proposed to insert:

And provided further, That subscriptions by the respective lodges or local organizations of the aforesaid fraternal societies, unions, and orders in behalf of their bona fide paying members and receipts to the lodges or local organizations for their members shall be evidence of subscription and payment, and individual subscriptions and receipts shall not be required.

Mr. CUMMINS. I see the spirit of that very clearly, but I hardly think it would conform to the practice of these societies. I doubt whether many of them, certainly not all of them, subscribe through subordinate lodges. I doubt whether a subordinate lodge makes a definite subscription for a certain number of papers. It may be so, but I doubt it.

Now, the whole purpose is to see to it that a part of the dues paid by each member shall be separated from other parts and assigned to the subscription for the paper. I suggest that instead of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan——

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the Senator will permit me, I did not propose the amendment. The Senator from New York proposed it. It was submitted to me. I contend, as the Senator from New York does, that what we ought to do is to adopt the House provision; but I thought if we had to provide for subscription, in order to meet the objections of a majority of the Senate, such a provision might be satisfactory.

Mr. CUMMINS. I misunderstood it. I thought the amendment had been offered by the Senator from Michigan, although composed by the Senator from New York. But upon reflection it seemed to me that this would cover the case and would guard against the evil which the chairman of the committee feels might result from the failure to attach any conditions to this additional privilege which is being granted.

Provided further—

May I have the attention of the Senator from Oregon, because I want him to consider this amendment? It is to be added possibly at the end of the proviso we are now discussing.

Mr. STONE. At line 1, page 37.

Mr. CUMMINS. On page 37, page 52 of the information print.

Provided further, That when such members pay therefor—

I am using the same words that are used above—

as a part of their dues or assessments, individual subscriptions or receipts shall not be required.

That does not enter into all the minutiæ or the form of keeping accounts or anything of that sort. It seems to me to put the whole matter where it will meet the views of the chairman of the committee. If the members pay as a part of their dues or assessments, no matter to whom they pay or what may be the form of their payment, then individual subscription shall not be required.

Mr. STONE. The receipts.

Mr. CUMMINS. The chairman of the committee has just asked me to state the connection. I will show him the connection in which this amendment would appear. It is that the privilege of these societies—shall be limited to copies mailed to such members as pay therefor, either as a part of their dues or assessments, or othewise, not less than 50 per cent of the regular subscription price; to other bona fide subscribers; to exchanges, and 10 per cent of such circulation as sample copies: Provided further, That when such members pay therefor as a part of their dues or assessments, individual subscriptions or receipts shall not be required.

I submit that to the chairman of the committee as a solution of the matter.

Mr. SWANSON. I hope the chairman of the committee will accept that. There is some difficulty about this Senate substitute for the House provision. A great many members of societies are entitled to the papers as a matter of right when they pay their annual dues, and then they are required to segregate and get a settlement which requires a good deal of bookkeeping and trouble. It seems to me the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa will prevent fake societies from organizing for the purpose of getting out advertising journals and at the same time it will get rid of the difficulties of which members of these organizations have complained all the time. Anyway, the amendment can go on the bill and it will be considered in conference between the House and the Senate. I am satisfied that we can frame an amendment in conference that will suit the situation and take care of honest fraternal societies and prevent the creation of fake ones.

Mr. BOURNE. I will say I had the same idea in mind and under consideration that the Senator from Virginia refers to, that we can take this matter into conference and work it out there. I do not want to be put in a position here of accepting this amendment, because at the present time it seems to me as if it emasculates entirely the provision sought to be put forth in the Senate amendment, and simply puts the matter in the same condition that it was in the Dodds bill as it came from the House.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, the Dodds bill or amendment applied to any member, whether a bona fide subscriber or not. This section applies to members who pay their dues and subscriptions.

Mr. TOWNSEND. This recognizes the subscription feature of the proposition and obviates the objection which has been made.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that there is a great difference between my amendment and the House provision. Of course I see no objection to the House provision, but others do. The House provision limits these privileges, among other things, to copies mailed to members. All that is required is that there shall be a mailing to members. My amendment provides that it must be paid for as a part of the dues of the association, whatever that association may be.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa what provision under his proviso is made for a subscription list for the periodical or paper? Where does he bring in, under that provision if adopted, the parity between conditions required of other newspapers and magazines and the fraternal organization periodicals?

Mr. CUMMINS. The subscription list under the amendment I have offered will be made up of members who have paid for the publication as a part of their dues, but in order to evidence that subscription it would not be necessary to show any direct communication between the publisher of the paper and the subscriber.

Mr. BOURNE. Then, I understand, Mr. President, it would simply be a legislative declaration that of the money received from members of organizations a part would be dues and a part would be for subscription to the paper, with no bookkeeping required and no list of subscribers other than the list of members of the organization.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is perfectly manifest that that result would not follow, because the Post Office Department could insist upon proof that the paper had been paid for by the member through the dues he had paid to his association.

Mr. BOURNE. What evidence would the association have in reference to the membership payment if it gave no receipt to its members for such payment?

Mr. CUMMINS. That would depend entirely upon the manner in which the association did business. It would have to do business so that the fact which I have recited there would appear, but it would not be an inflexible rule which would compel all associations to use the same form of receipt or of bookkeeping or of method of doing business.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me? I was called from the Chamber before the Senator offered his amendment. Therefore I am not familiar with it. I wish to cite an illustration, and see whether I may be anywhere near the idea any other Senator has of this matter. There seems to be a great diversity of opinion.

Take the National Geographic Society as an illustration, of which most of us are members, a society, I think, of nearly 50,000 people. They issue a magazine that comes to the subscribers. I think the magazine is worth about $5 a year, and we pay $2 a year to get the magazine. Would there be any embarrassment to that association in the matter of keeping books? I think they do not keep books; they do not issue receipts; but they simply ask a man to become a member at $2 a year, and they send him this magazine, and that ends it.

As far as that society is concerned, I would not want to embarrass such an association. I do not know that the bill or the amendment the Senator has offered does that. I think we ought to be careful about a matter of that kind. I apprehend that nineteen-twentieths of the members—perhaps almost every member of that society—gets the magazine simply as a gratuity in one sense; yet he pays $2 a year for membership in the society.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think really the amendment I have offered would differentiate that case from others, and probably it would not relate to just the thing the Senator from New Hampshire has in mind. The law which is now proposed is intended to require the National Geographic Society, if it issues a publication and receives from each of its members a yearly due, to specify in the receipt that part of the payment which was intended as compensation for the mere privilege of belonging to the society and that part of it which was intended to pay for the paper.

Mr. GALLINGER. They would all accept one or the other, if they chose.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the general purpose. I say——

Mr. SWANSON. I will state to the Senator from New Hampshire that under the Senate committee amendment the case stated by him could not occur. I am a member of the National Geographic Society. It issues one of the best magazines that is published. I enjoy it very much. It costs $2 a year. The regular subscription is $5. Under the Senate committee amendment you could not receive that magazine, because you could not receive it for less than 50 per cent of the regular price for which they sell it. It would allow a member of a fraternal order to get it at 50 per cent of the regular price included in the dues. What these fraternal orders object to in the Senate committee amendment is the condition as to fixing up the mail and the price of their subscriptions. I offered in the committee an amendment to get rid of that difficulty, but it was not favored. I proposed to limit it to members who are entitled to receive the same by the rules and regulations of the society, union, or order on account of the payment of dues, assessments, or fees. It did not try to fix the amount; it did not require a subscription list to be furnished, but in the case of a society like the National Geographic Society, by its rules and regulations anybody who was a regular member and paid his annual dues each year was entitled to the publication and that he should be considered as a bona fide subscriber. I think that ought to be done to get rid of the fake societies.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have no disposition to delay the consideration of this bill. Indeed, I want it hastened as much as possible, and I have only a word to say on this general subject.

I take great comfort, Mr. President, always in the knowledge that when amendments which are contested on this floor are finally adopted they go to conference, and that six wise men sit down in the solitude of the committee room and, as a rule, reach wiser conclusions than this body or the other House can in a general debate. Whatever amendment we put on this bill dealing with this matter will be subject to that crucial test in the committee room, the conference committee being composed of three Members of this body and three Members of the House of Representatives. So I fell reasonably sanguine that whatever we do, or however crude or unsatisfactory it may be, it will come out of the committee of conference in reasonably good shape.

I have a very profound conviction that we ought to deal very generously with these fraternal orders. They ought not to be subjected to harsh rules and regulations on legislation, because they are doing a work that some of us know, as the Senator from Missouri so well stated to-day, is educational, and, to use a term that I do not very much like, has a tendency to uplift humanity.

I have not any sympathy with another class of publications, and I do not know exactly how this legislation or other legislation may deal with it. I have in my mind a concern in New England that used to ship six carloads of trash each week, carried at a much lower rate of postage than enough to compensate the Government for the transportation. I have not any sympathy with that sort of literature or with concerns that engage by the wholesale in that class of publications.

Now, Mr. President, that is all I care to say. I want to record myself as voting, if I can intelligently grasp this complicated question, to do what I conceive to be the right and generous thing in so far as these literary and scientific and historical publications are concerned. I also want to vote, if I can know just how my vote should be cast, against overloading our postal cars with publications that have not any real value and that are simply published for gain, which reach enormous proportions in some instances of which I have some knowledge.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, I will ask to substitute for the amendment the Secretary read the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], which, as I understand, he suggests would follow the word "copies," in line 1, on page 37. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon modifies his amendment. The Secretary will read the amendment as now offered.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the proposed committee amendment, as printed in the bill at the top of page 37, line 1, after the word "copies," insert:

Provided further, That when such members pay therefor as a part of their dues or assessments, individual subscriptions or receipts shall not be required.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon if that amendment does not vest a wide discretionary power in the department, and if it is not substantially what it exercises now.

Mr. BOURNE. I would far rather the Senator from Michigan should propound that inquiry to the Senator from Iowa, who is the father of the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I was not looking so much for the father as I was after the welfare of the child and to the effect of the legislation. I asked my question of the honored Senator from Oregon because I knew he had given a great deal of thought to the subject. It seems to me that the amendment makes little concession and practically reiterates the present law.

Mr. CUMMINS. The present law in that particular respect is not objectionable. The only thing in the present law which is objectionable and which is found to be a very great obstacle and, I think, an unjust hardship to the circulation of these publications is that they are not permitted to carry advertisements. The purpose of the change of the law is to remove that obstacle, but in removing it it is sought to attach other conditions, many of which I think are very wise; but among those conditions you will find language which will bear the interpretation that there must be some direct communication between the publisher of the paper and the member of the society—some receipt, some individual subscription. It is to remove any such possible interpretation in what we are now doing that I have proposed the amendment which has just been accepted by the chairman of the committee.

Answering, now, directly the question of the Senator from Michigan, I will say that the law now is that there need be no individual receipt. That is the ruling of the Post Office Department. But unfortunately that ruling applies only to papers published by fraternal societies and other societies which contain no advertising matter. We want to preserve the present interpretation of the law, so far as treating membership in a society and the payment of dues in that society as a subscription to the paper are concerned. So I think there will be no trouble along the line suggested by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My only concern in asking the question is that a bona fide circulation may not be the subject of continual review by the Post Office Department to the annoyance and injury and detriment of the publishers. Every few weeks some one is summoned before the department and required to produce again the receipts of subscribers. If they do not happen to have them on the day they are summoned they are criticized, restrained, and perhaps forbidden the appropriate use of the mails.

I have many instances in my own mind now where that has been done. I would much prefer to see the law plain, direct, and positive. If we are to enlarge the scope of the present law by providing admission of these publications to the mails, I should like to see it done in language that can not be mistaken, and not left discretionary with the Postmaster General.

These publications are entitled to fair treatment and the widest possible liberty consistent with the economical administration of the Post Office Department. I hope the law may not be left indefinite, and that discretionary power may not again be vested by Congress in these officials who, while honest, are vexatious and unnecessarily annoying to people whose vocation and employment is deserving of our solicitude. I favor the Dodds amendment, so called, in the House bill and hope it will be retained in the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from Michigan, but he will at once see that my amendment or the amendment which has been accepted by the Senator from Oregon, whatever else it does, restricts the field of discretion and provides positively that under certain conditions individual subscriptions shall not be required.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question. Following the same line of argument that he has outlined in his amendment, does he not think that the House provision restricting the circulation to bona fide members of the organization is a more direct and better provision than what we are attempting to enact by this amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly; I am for the House provision; but I am doing what little I can to amend a substitute for the House provision which has been proposed by the Senate committee.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa another question. There is not a single amendment that has been proposed, either in committee or on this floor, the effect of which can not be avoided by the unscrupulous who may do the very thing that we are trying to keep them from doing. Does the Senator not agree with me there?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not wholly. I think——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. What would prevent what might be called a fake society, with only a nominal membership fee, declaring that in that nominal fee were included membership dues and pay for the paper? We do not prescribe how much the subscription shall cost; we do not prescribe how much the membership dues shall be; but we simply say 50 per cent of the regular subscription price. If they desired to send advertisements at the expense of the Government, could they not under any provision that we may make organize societies with nominal dues and load the mails, a practice which we are trying to prevent now?

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly there is a door there that might be opened by the unscrupulous, and there could be some abuse of the privilege granted; but I think, if we are not to have the House provision, that the Senate committee provision does guard to a degree the public and the Government.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I should like to go on record here on this matter. I was in the committee when the bill was considered and, perhaps, I should have reserved the right not to accept the amendment, but in view of my study of this question I am persuaded that the discretionary powers that would necessarily arise under any amendment restricting circulation would give rise possibly to abuse on the part of the post-office authorities. I think the most direct way to reach the matter is to adopt the House provision, which says that publications may be sent to bona fide subscribers. I would prefer to see the House provision agreed to than to adopt any amendment to shut off, on the one hand, the unscrupulous and at the same time restrict the right worthy societies ought to have. I do not believe it is good policy to penalize institutions of great worth to the people because there are others that are not of great worth, and I do not see how we can afford to restrict meritorious societies by virtue of our legislation for the sake of attempting to save the Government a few dollars and in an effort to shut out some unworthy societies.

Mr. BOURNE. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that we are trying to prevent discrimination, and the remedy we think is a reclassification of the second-class mail matter under which the Government is now carrying the publications of these organizations, allowing benevolent and fraternal societies to carry advertisements, but requiring a subscription list.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. You have allowed them all to carry advertising.

Mr. BOURNE. No; we have not. They come here and ask to be permitted to carry advertising.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But it is proposed in this bill to remove that restriction. You allow them, under this bill, to carry advertising and then provide restrictions; that is what this bill proposes.

Mr. BOURNE. This bill proposes to put them on a par with other periodicals and magazines coming under the second-class mail privilege, and nothing else whatever.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Now, let us refer for a moment to those magazines and periodicals which are put on a par with the publications now accorded the second-class privilege. The latter class are not the periodicals of a society or an organization.

Mr. BOURNE. They are second-class mail matter, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I understand; but here is the point I want to bring before the Senate: The individual publications that have the second-class mail privilege are private ventures; they have got to have pay for their publication. The others are the organs of societies or organizations, and the dues that are paid stand in lieu of the subscription price in the case of the others. They are on exactly the same plane. The dues of the organization pay for the subscription; the subscription price of the private publication is paid by the individual. Now, you extend the privilege of advertising to both and yet you do not pretend to try to control the subscription price of the private paper, but you do provide a restriction in connection with the subscription price of the organization paper.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator is entirely mistaken there. The Post Office Department now exercises and has always exercised a power of supervision and inspection over newspapers and magazines. It does not hesitate to send an inspector into a newspaper office to examine its subscription list, to check up its cash receipts, and learn whether the paper is going to bona fide subscribers or not.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. What minimum are they allowed to charge a year?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That varies somewhat, and I am not able to state. Of course, it depends on the periodicity, the size of the publication, and so forth. The privileges of the second-class mail have been refused to those publications that merely charge a nominal price and are essentially advertising publications.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But they have no strict supervision over what shall be charged.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They have, and they exercise it; and I think that the amendment which is offered by the Senator from Iowa is quite a happy solution of this situation. Just as the Post Office Department now enters the newspaper office and the magazine office to see whether it has a bona fide circulation as manifested by cash receipts, so the Post Office Department will enter the offices of the fraternal organizations to see whether those who are receiving the publications of such organizations are members of the society and are paying their dues.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Well, why would it not be exactly parallel for the inspector to go to the secretary of the organization and find out what are the membership dues?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That will be the practice, I understand, under the Senator's amendment.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Why would it not be the practice under the House provision?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not discussing the House provision. I understand the committee has accepted this amendment; and I think, as modified by the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, it offers a very happy solution of the difficulty. I think that the House provision is rather too vague. I think it might leave even more power with the Post Office Department than would the Senate amendment.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Well, Mr. President, I merely wanted to record myself here as being in favor of the broadest possible liberality to the fraternal organizations. I think the difficulty has been solved in the House provision, and, while I shall not discuss this amendment further, I shall reserve the right to vote against it.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire some information, and I think the Senator from Oregon can give it to me. As I understand, there are some sixteen or eighteen million people who belong to fraternal organizations or organizations of the different classes described and covered by the provisions of the bill we are considering.

Mr. BOURNE. Does the Senator from Missouri want the answer now?

Mr. STONE. I have not yet asked the question.

Mr. BOURNE. Very well.

Mr. STONE. The societies, with this enormous membership, are engaged in a business we all consider meritorious and highly worthy in every way. I am in sympathy with the general purpose of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to eliminate from the second-class mail the great mass of matter that ought not to be admitted under that classification, burdening it and entailing an enormous expense on the Government, but the publications issued by fraternal societies, in numerous instances at least, do not come within that class. I understood the Senator to say that there were twenty-six or twenty-seven thousand publications issued by somebody that are, in the main, mere advertising publications; fake publications, in a way. I do not ask the Senator, unless he cares to tell me or to tell the Senate, to just what publications he refers, but I should like to have a little more definite information as to their general class. To what kind of publications does the Senator refer?

Mr. BOURNE. I stated that there were over 26,000 newspapers, magazines, and periodicals in the United States enjoying the privileges of second-class mail; but I did not refer to them as mere advertising sheets or fake publications, but as legitimate publications. I should like to say to the Senator from Missouri——

Mr. STONE. Do I understand the Senator to say that he would refuse the second-class mail privilege to all these publications?

Mr. BOURNE. No. I said that we required from these 26,000 and odd newspapers, magazines, and periodicals that they should have a bona fide subscription list in order to entitle them to come under the second-class mail privilege.

I will also state, in reference to the membership—I understood the Senator to say that these organizations had a membership of some sixteen or seventeen million, if I correctly understood him——

Mr. STONE. That is the information I had.

Mr. BOURNE. When we had our hearings, the information we received from the representatives of the various organizations in the United States was that they had in the aggregate about 8,000,000 members in all these organizations affected by the provisions of the Dodds amendment.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I do not know whether we shall have a yea-and-nay vote on this bill. If we do not have one, I desire to say that I shall vote to sustain the House provision.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, I will ask to have the Secretary read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa to the committee amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the proposed committee amendment, at the top of page 37, line 1, after the word "copies," it is proposed to insert:

Provided further, That when such members pay therefor, as a part of their dues or assessments, individual subscriptions or receipts shall not be required.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs upon the adoption of the amendment as amended.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if in order, I move to strike out the amendment proposed by the committee, beginning with the proviso, in line 18, on page 36, and going down to the word "Provided," in line 1, on page 37. I make this motion for the purpose of restoring so much of the House bill as is known as the Dodds amendment, beginning in line 11 on page 36, and which reads as follows:

Provided, That the circulation through the mails of periodical publications, issued by or under the auspices of benevolent or fraternal societies or orders or trades-unions, or by strictly professional, literary, historical, or scientific societies, as second-class matter, shall be limited to copies mailed to members, exchanges, and bona fide subscribers, together with 10 per cent of such circulation in addition as sample copies.

By striking out the committee amendment we restore so much of the bill as I have just read, included in the House bill, known as the Dodds amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Michigan that a motion to strike out is not necessary. If the committee amendment is rejected it will restore the House provision. That is the proper parliamentary procedure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I quite agree with the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. A vote to reject the committee amendment would accomplish the Senator's object.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I wish to state in connection with this matter that in the committee I offered an amendment to the House provision, which, in my opinion, would have effectually accomplished what we desire to accomplish and prevented the abuse that has been pointed out. That amendment was not adopted by the committee, and I reserved the right to urge it in connection with this matter when the bill came into the Senate. The amendment I suggested would enable a society like the National Geographic Society to send its publications to its members.

As between the Senate committee amendment and the House provision, I shall vote for the House provision in preference to the Senate committee amendment even as amended.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand, the question is upon the committee amendment as amended, and if that is voted down the House provision stands?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct. The question is upon the committee amendment as amended. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan and Mr. SMITH of South Carolina called for a division.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the yeas and nays. A division is always unsatisfactory.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JONES. The question is on restoring the part of the bill that was stricken out by the committee, as I understand?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Dodds amendment.

Mr. BOURNE. As I understand, the vote is on the adoption of the Senate committee amendment as amended by the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. Is that correct?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct. The Chair will state, in reply to the inquiry of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], that nothing has as yet been stricken out of the bill, so that the question of restoration does not apply.

Mr. JONES. So the amendment of the committee to strike out a portion of the bill is not being voted upon now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understands.

Mr. JONES. That is what I want to get at.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is to strike out and insert, the two joined together, and the question now is upon both.

Mr. JONES. Is that the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To strike out and insert.

Mr. JONES. Is that the amendment we are now voting upon?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understands.

Mr. JONES. That is what I want to understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that a negative vote will leave in the bill all that is proposed to be stricken out. The question is on the adoption of the amendment to strike out and insert, upon which the yeas and nays were ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN].

Mr. CLAPP (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr SIMMONS]. If he were present and I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. I am informed by his colleague that he thinks the Senator from Mississippi would vote the same as I would upon this question, and therefore I think I am authorized to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I transfer the pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. I transfer the pair to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WETMORE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

I will also state that my colleague [Mr. LIPPITT], who is unavoidably detained from the Chamber, is paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. If my colleague were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the negative). I desire to inquire whether the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] has voted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. I transfer it to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM. In order to make a quorum, I transfer my pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WETMORE. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY].

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS—27.

Bourne	Crawford	Lodge	Sanders
Bristow	Cullom	McCumber	Smith, Ga.
Bryan	Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Smoot
Catron	Gallinger	Massey	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Gronna	Nelson	Wetmore
Cark, Wyo.	Heyburn	Penrose	Williams
Crane	Hitchcock	Root

NAYS—25.

Ashurst	Martin, Va.	Shively	Thornton
Bankhead	Myers	Simmons	Tillman
Cummins	Overman	Smith, Ariz.	Townsend
Johnston, Ala.	Page	Smith, Mich.	Watson
Jones	Poindexter	Smith, S. C.
Kenyon	Pomerene	Stone
La Follette	Reed	Swanson

NOT VOTING—42.

Bacon	Clarke, Ark.	Gore	Paynter
Bailey	Culberson	Guggenheim	Percy
Borah	Curtis	Johnson, Me.	Perkins
Bradley	Davis	Kern	Rayner
Brandegee	Dillingham	Lea	Richardson
Briggs	Dixon	Lippitt	Smith, Md.
Brown	du Pont	McLean	Stephenson
Burnham	Fall	Newlands	Warren
Burton	Foster	O'Gorman	Works
Chilton	Gamble	Oliver
Clapp	Gardner	Owen

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to give notice that when this amendment comes into the Senate I am going to move to strike it out and insert the House provision with the amendment I offered to it.

PAYMENT OF PENSIONS.

Mr. McCUMBER. Out of order I wish to introduce a joint resolution and have it referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

I will state that the object of the joint resolution is to provide for the payment of pensions during the time the two Houses are in conference upon the general pension appropriation bill.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 128) making appropriations to pay such pensions as may be due and payable on or before August 4, 1912, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads if he is willing to give way to me to allow a brief executive session? There are some important things to be done.

Mr. BOURNE. I am very glad to accommodate the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 22 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, August 2, 1912, at 11 o'clock a. m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate August 1, 1912.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY.

Ensign Ralph D. Weyerbacher to be an assistant naval constructor in the Navy from the 1st day of May, 1912, to fill a vacancy, and to correct the wording of a former nomination confirmed by the Senate on May 10, 1912.

Ensign Thomas B. Richey to be an assistant naval constructor in the Navy from the 25th day of June, 1912, to fill a vacancy.

The following-named lieutenant commanders to be commanders in the Navy from the 1st day of July, 1912, to fill vacancies:

Joel R. P. Pringle,
Charles J. Lang, and
Martin E. Trench.

The following-named lieutenants to be lieutenant commanders in the Navy from the 1st day of July, 1912, to fill vacancies:

John D. Wainwright,
Harry K. Cage,
Charles S. Freeman,
Robert L. Berry, and Ward K. Wortman.

Passed Asst. Paymaster James F. Kutz to be a paymaster in the Navy from the 26th day of February, 1911, to fill a vacancy.

POSTMASTERS.

ILLINOIS.

John Murvin to be postmaster at Louisville, Ill., in place of John Murvin. Incumbent's commission expired May 11, 1912.

KANSAS.

William C. Markham to be postmaster at Baldwin City (late Baldwin), Kans., in place of William C. Markham, to change name of office.

MONTANA.

Benjamin Urner to be postmaster at Harlowton, Mont., in place of Benjamin T. Stevens, resigned.

NORTH DAKOTA.

Charles R. Kendall to be postmaster at Granville, N. Dak., in place of Jessie M. Pierson, deceased.

OHIO.

Charles E. Bake to be postmaster at College Corner, Ohio, in place of John C. Douglas. Incumbent's commission expired May 16, 1912.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Henry W. Des Portes to be postmaster at Ridgeway, S. C. Office became presidential January 1, 1912.

TENNESSEE.

John W. Akin to be postmaster at Rutherford, Tenn. Office became presidential January 1, 1908.

E. A. Morgan to be postmaster at Huntingdon, Tenn., in place of Atlas M. Lee. Incumbent's commission expired January 30, 1910.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate August 1, 1912.

POSTMASTERS.

GEORGIA.

Mattie Mitchell, Acworth.

MINNESOTA.

George F. Kramer, South St. Paul.

TEXAS.

George H. Sparenberg, Big Spring.

WITHDRAWALS.

Executive nominations withdrawn August 1, 1912.

POSTMASTERS.

TENNESSEE.

INJUNCTION OF SECRECY REMOVED.

Thursday, August 1, 1912.

The injunction of secrecy was removed from an agreement signed on July 20, 1912, by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and Great Britain adopting, with certain modifications therein, the rules and method of procedure recommended in the award of The Hague tribunal of September 7, 1910, for the settlement hereafter, in accordance with the principles laid down in the award, of questions regarding the exercise of the fishing liberties referred to in article 1 of the treaty of October 20, 1818, between the United States and Great Britain.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, August 1, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Rev. William Couden, of Norwalk, Ohio, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, grant unto us, Thy children, consciences firm yet tender, and obedience true as the path of the daily sun. We thank Thee that Thou hast not made us irresponsible like the creatures of lower orders than we; we thank Thee that Thou hast given us work to do and problems to solve. And we bless Thee that Thou hast provided us guide, counsel, and equipment for life's responsibilities. Grant, O Lord, that what we do and say to-day shall be in accord with Thy commandments, the Sermon on the Mount, and the spirit of the Cross of Christ. We offer this prayer in the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE COTTON SCHEDULE.

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House——

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for five minutes on the subject of mines and mining prospects——

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House we are to have general debate for three hours, and the following gentlemen have applied to the Chair for time: Mr. SHARP of Ohio, 40 minutes; Mr. FERGUSSON of New Mexico, 20 minutes; Mr. RUCKER of Colorado, 20 minutes, and Mr. DONOHOE of Pennsylvania, 20 minutes. That makes an hour and 40 minutes. If the first three use their time, Mr. DONOHOE will only get 10 minutes. Now, the Chair wants to inquire, because he wants to be fair about it, whether there are any Republicans here who want any of this 3 hours?

Mr. FOSTER. You might inquire whether there are any Republicans here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants to be fair about the division of this time of 3 hours.

Mr. FOSTER. Are there any Republicans here?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not recognize any difference between Republicans.

Mr. BURNETT. The bull moose crowd are here.

The SPEAKER. The bull moose are just the same as any other crowd, as far as the Speaker is concerned. The Chair repeats the question, Are there any Republicans here who want any part of this 3 hours time in general debate? The Chair will try to get the gentleman from California in, but the Chair promised to recognize the gentleman from Ohio for 40 minutes.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mark me down for 10 minutes after the others get through.

The SPEAKER. If we have the 10 minutes.

Mr. FOWLER. Before the gentleman from Ohio proceeds, I will be glad to get unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the question of salaries of public officers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] desires to ask unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the same request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Mr. Speaker, I was not in the House when debate took place in reference to the anti-injunction bill, and I would like to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on that subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the anti-injunction bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP] for 40 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, I only wish to express the hope that the kindly and generous applause which has greeted the announcement that I would have 40 minutes' time of the House this afternoon may be reflected in the reception which, if it is not accorded to what I shall say, may nevertheless be given to the merits of the subject on which I wish to speak. This is not a new subject, but still it is so comparatively recent in development that it seems to me it is not inappropriate, especially at this time, to talk somewhat at length upon its merits, as it involves future legislation of Congress in a number of phases in which it may be considered. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is peculiarly apropos to-day, inasmuch as very soon we shall be called to vote upon a very important question, the determination of which has engaged the attention of both branches of Congress for several weeks past and over which it appears to me we are apparently at loggerheads. However, I make the prediction, if I may assume the rôle for the time being of a prophet, that, as in most cases in the past where the two Houses have been diametrically opposed to each other, we will finally compromise, and the Senate will give way on one side, and this House will rescind its action in caucus finally voting for one battleship. This is merely a gratuitous prophecy in which I am indulging and is given for what it is worth. Surely, neither a false pride nor a stubbornness born of an unwillingness to give in should prevent this House from doing what is right.

While there was no record kept of the learned debates in our caucuses upon this subject of providing for two battleships, yet I think I may with justice say that, judging from the arguments advanced by the advocates pro and con on this question, the difference of opinion arises largely not from a lack of patriotism on the part of any of my Democratic colleagues, because we all want to provide an adequate national defense, but, rather, from a fixed opinion on the part of many that two battleships are not needed at this time. I am perfectly willing to concur in that judgment. At least I shall so vote if given opportunity, though I shall with pleasure vote for a compromise proposition involving the building of one battleship. I have from time to time, as you have, listened to the arguments of the gentlemen who want a very great and powerful Navy. I have listened, as you have, and been highly edified, especially by those of my friend from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON], and while respecting his learning and judgment—and we all have had abundant attestation of his bravery—yet this query has always run through my mind, whether in a practical sense that gentleman, with all his knowledge of our Navy's needs and the relative strength of other nations, has taken into account that we are surrounded by geographical conditions, if you please, which radically differentiate our Nation from any other nation on the face of the earth. [Applause.]

The Creator of all, who has been wonderfully kind to the people who have settled and multiplied upon our broad lands, in the process of world making ages ago spread on each side of our continent a protection that is greater than all the navies, greater than all the standing armies—an expanse of ocean waters 3,000 miles in width. Only our insular possessions are vulnerable, and we should restore and make free the Philippines just as soon as the ability of whose people to govern themselves seems assured.

While traveling in continental Europe one sees the display of military power almost at every hour and on every hand. We are to take into consideration that only an imaginary line, such as divides our States here, divides those great powers, and only a little channel, that has already been traveled by the birdman in the small fraction of an hour, separates those countries from England. And, then, contrasting our favored geographical position among the nations of the earth, it seems to me the contention for a great navy, to vie with those powers surrounded by conditions so widely different from ours, lacks force.

Mr. BURNETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SHARP. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. Was the gentleman one of those who signed the call for a Democratic caucus and then bolted?

Mr. SHARP. No, sir; I was not.

Mr. BURNETT. Do you think one has a right to sign that paper and then come out and sign a paper to bolt the Democratic caucus?

Mr. SHARP. No, sir. I refused to sign that paper. [Applause.] Let me call the attention of those gentlemen who would advocate building at this time two battleships to the fact that it means an outlay of the huge sum of $30,000,000. At this present moment the greatest concern of England and of Germany lies in their ever-increasing expense of naval equipment, and the situation seems to me much like two quarreling schoolboys, each challenging the other to knock the proverbial chip off his shoulder. The result each time is the addition of two or three more battleships. At this very moment, while England is struggling for supremacy, or rather to retain the supremacy she already has upon the seas, there is a strike of the dock laborers over in London, thousands of whom are unable to get their daily bread. The taxes upon the people have become so enormous that her own statesmen are questioning if it has not come already to a pass where England, with all her revenues, will have to borrow additional money with which to meet the constantly increasing expenses involved in keeping up her great navy. Where and when will it all end! Must a great war for supremacy actually come before a disarmament shall be agreed to? I have never been one of those who have been willing to believe that Japan, for instance—a friendly country that has been so many times cited as the enemy ever ready to come and overwhelm our shores—even if she intended war at a future time, could do more than inflict damage upon our coast cities. The minute her soldiers would undertake to invade our territory they would be met by an immense, resourceful Army, always ready for the call of duty, and would be stopped and defeated.

But I must confess that, on account of the recent developments of certain inventions which have come about within the last few years, my confidence in the inviolability of our territory from interior attack has been somewhat shaken. It is to the discussion of that new element, which has already become an important factor in the method of modern warfare, that I will devote the remainder of my remarks.

I wish to speak to-day upon the development of aerial navigation. The invention of the aeroplane—the "heavier-than-air" machine as yet only partially perfected in so far as safety is concerned—in my judgment—and I say it after careful thought, for I have given considerable time to the study of this subject—will not only revolutionize the present method of warfare, but will materially affect our methods of transportation and reach over into the scientific field of research, bringing to us truths at which we have only guessed in the past. In the brief time in which I am to speak I am going to divide my remarks into three natural divisions which, it occurs to me, the nature of the subject permits.

I wish, first, to consider it as a means of national defense and attack; then I shall devote some time to its commercial aspect; and, lastly, I shall conclude my remarks, if I may, by a brief summary of that which, it seems to me, this new field of discovery holds in store for the world in the advancement of scientific knowledge.

Among a number of bills and resolutions which I introduced some time ago was one which called upon the Secretary of War to furnish information, to be given to this House, throwing some light on the present development of aviation in the United States, and our standing or position as compared with the advance of this science in other countries. I wish to say that if the gentlemen who hear me have not had the pleasure of reading this interesting report, contained in House Document 718, I would be very glad if, at their leisure some time—if not during the busy closing hours of this session of Congress, then at least in their vacation—they would peruse its pages.

I may at the outset say that upon the face of this report, which contains eighty-odd pages of very interesting matter, our own relative position in the field of aviation is well emphasized when I tell you that but eight pages are devoted to the development of that science in our own country of America, which gave, as we all know, the very founders, the original discoverers—Langley, the Wright brothers, Burgess, and Curtis—in this field of navigating the air by aeroplane.

If I were to use a blackboard at the front of the Clerk's desk and illustrate in another manner the relative extent of our development as compared with that of other countries in this most important work, I could draw a line at least 3 feet in length to represent the position of France, and then away down at the bottom, after such countries as Austria and Italy, I would have to draw one, not exceeding an inch in length, representing its growth in the United States. Or, if I were pictorially inclined and wished to draw upon that blackboard a modern aeroplane and give to it a width of plane of 3 feet, representing the aeroplane strength of France, taking up almost the entire size of the blackboard, I could fairly represent the relative position of the United States Government by pinning upon it one of the smallest butterflies that you may see playing about the Capitol Grounds.

Perhaps a better way of putting it in a dollars-and-cents aspect would be to say that we appropriated, as you gentlemen remember, in a bill reported out of the Committee on Military Affairs, $75,000 for the construction of aeroplanes for the Army for the ensuing year. For a like period France contributed over $4,000,000. Germany came a close second; and then England, Italy, Austria, Russia, and one or two others of the smaller powers.

That shows the position in which we are placed to-day, gentlemen; and it is with the hope that my efforts may at least arouse the spirit of this Congress to lend additional aid in a field of enterprise that is bound to become the most important, along the lines I have mentioned, of anything in modern times that I am making these remarks. Congress can not stop it. It can only aid in its progress.

I know, as most of you gentlemen know in a general way, the relative size of our Navy as compared with the navies of Great Britain, Germany, Japan, and France. But I wish to call your attention to a remarkable change that has come over the continental countries of Europe during the past year. We all remember the ominous headlines which appeared in our newspapers last year over dispatches giving accounts of the ever-increasing friction between France and Germany, and how it was then stated that if war came between those Governments, France would have the cooperation and friendly aid of England. Whether that was true I do not know. But I do know that some of the best experts, some of the most thorough students of the methods of warfare, have said since that time that had war been declared between France and Germany, there is little doubt but what France would have been able to literally overwhelm Germany with its fleet—I might with propriety use another expression and say flock—of bomb-laden aeroplanes.

Let me read to you in this connection the words of our Assistant Secretary of War, Gen. Robert Shaw Oliver, who has given this subject considerable attention. He says:

> It is not at all impossible for several aeroplanes of the present types to start from a vessel off the Virginia Capes, fly to Washington, and each aeroplane drop 150 pounds of explosives upon the Capitol and public buildings of Washington. It is to be hoped that the aviation service of the American Army will be developed to such an extent that such a raid by hostile aeroplanes will not be successful.

I think it is but just to say that the officers of both our Army and Navy who have specialized, so to speak, upon the value of the aeroplane as a necessary adjunct to the regular equipment are entitled to much credit for the results already accomplished in this field. Without any spectacular advertising of the fact in their respective lines of work, they have greatly developed the efficiency with which the aeroplane and hydroplane can be made useful. The work of Capts. Chandler and Beck when flying, before this art had become as free from risk as improvement has now made it, has been of great value, not only in actual development but in popularizing the art among their fellow associates. Quite equal praise is due also to other officers in this work who have assumed risks that few men care to take. That these men ought to be far more liberally recognized, both in advancement in rank and pay, while detailed to their perilous duty seems too evident to need argument. I am glad to say that the House Committee on Military Affairs has already, in a measure, indorsed this view. No reward seems too great for the soldiers of other governments who risk martyrdom for the defense of their country quite as much as though they were constantly placed in the front of the firing line.

I feel confident that the kind of training which turns out, at West Point and Annapolis, the best engineers and navy experts in the world will also give to us the bravest and most skilled aeronauts, no matter whether their services are to be directed in the line of warfare or in the nobler work of increasing our knowledge for the common good of man. To this end Congress—the only branch of the Government that can give such aid—ought to make liberal appropriations. I would have a commission appointed, the personnel of which should comprise men skilled in the science, who would have authority to visit those countries abroad which have made such rapid progress in the development of various kinds of air craft. Who would doubt the value of their investigations in acquainting themselves with the systems employed in the numerous aerodynamic laboratories which are fast reducing the construction of aeroplanes down to a scientific basis and eliminating their dangers, giving to them stability and safety; inspection of the many factories turning out aeroplanes; a study of the military disposition of this "fourth-arm" service, and governmental regulations for the issuing of licenses, etc.? Or who can estimate the advance in the present state of our knowledge of this subject if the Smithsonian Institution, encouraged by a liberal appropriation of money, could be permitted to rehabilitate the laboratory of the late Prof. Langley, who early saw the necessity of such an institution?

Would not a competitive contest, authorized by the Government and conducted under certain rules and requiremens suggested by Gen. Allen, of the Signal Corps, and Capt. W. I. Chambers, of the United States Navy—men who have already done so much to advance this work—be effective through the distribution of liberal prizes in securing better types of equipment, and especially of engines, for which we now have to go abroad?

Not to refer to the splendid work which is being done by several of the journals in the large cities of this country for the cause of aeronautics would be ungenerous. During the past few years they have disseminated a great amount of useful information throughout the country and have done much to arouse public sentiment in favor of its development. They have truly been the pioneers in a work which, even from a material standpoint, will prove to be of great value to our people. The only reason why we have not come to a full realization of the potentiality back of aeroplanes lies in the fact that we have had no real war. I predict that when such a war comes the base of operations will not be the surface of the earth, but up in the clouds.

The trite saying that "truth is stranger than fiction" has not only come to be generally accepted, but it is sometimes stranger than the most unbridled poetic license. More than a half century ago, as if given the power of divination, England's poet laureate wrote this stanza:

> For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
> Saw the vision of the world and all the wonder that would be;
> Saw the heavens fill with commerce, argosies of magic sails,
> Pilots of the purple twilight, dropping down with costly bales;
> Heard the heavens fill with shouting, and there rained a ghastly dew
> From the heavens' airy navies grappling in the central blue.

Tennyson's vision is a reality of to-day. All the civilized nations—I was almost going to say except our own—have come to realize that "from the heavens' airy navies grappling in the central blue" is bound to come the greatest source of danger from attack.

Fifty years ago there were many momentous engagements between the armies of the North and South when, if one army could have known the maneuvering for position of the hostile force only a few miles away, or with only a wood intervening, it would have been of incalculable benefit.

Do you not remember how 14 years ago our fleet was stationed for days in front of the harbor of Santiago and the question was very serious in the minds of our commanders whether Cervera's fleet was back in that landlocked harbor or whether in the nighttime it had taken wings and flown away and escaped?

If we had had an aerial HOBSON flying one of these aeroplanes then, instead of heroically trying to blockade the harbor's mouth with a sunken boat he could have come back in 30 minutes and said to our commanders: "The ships of the enemy lie back of those hills. They are even now preparing to steam out in their dash to escape." He would have given their tonnage, their number, and their disposition. This is all coming to pass in the near future—nay, is now here.

The army experts abroad have referred to aviation as the "fourth arm" of the army. That is a good term, but I think of another one which seems to me quite as appropriate. I would call it the third eye, the eye that sees from the back of the head, and from which no concealment of position is possible. From this time on there will never come a war between civilized nations where either can mask its fort behind a hill or a wood and hope for one single moment to conceal the presence of its forces, because away up in the clouds there will be the far-seeing eye of the aviator, and, without having to alight, he will report back by wireless the position of every detachment of an attacking army.

May I in passing remind you of the wonderful spectacle exhibited by the Italian army in attacking the Turkish forces at Tripoli last spring. You know what terrible havoc those men up in the air created. If the contending hosts of the Greeks and Persians at Salamis twenty-four centuries ago could have foreseen these wonderful instruments of warfare, men flying in the clouds and dropping their implements of destruction upon their ships, they would have created and deified a new god to whom to attribute supernal powers of destruction, for in all their category they had no god, even in the most poetic flights of their imagination, that could rise to the heights of such an accomplished fact. Mythology gives us no instance of a Jovian power so great. [Applause.]

I am not one of those who desire war. I would like to see it eliminated, but I sometimes wonder if it will only be stopped when the means of destruction have become so deadly and have developed to such a dreadful degree of efficiency that the nation which strikes the first blow will annihilate its enemy. Then, and only then, will peace come.

Let me advance one thought along this line of building up our own national defense. Sometimes we are accused of not bringing to bear upon all subjects of legislation the same business acumen which we would use in our own private affairs. I have hardly been willing to believe this, because we have here, as our distinguished Speaker of this House has said on several occasions, an assembly of earnest and patriotic men, and he has had an experience that certainly ought to enable him to speak with knowledge. But it seems to me not an untimely question to ask of the zealous advocates of the two-battleship propaganda, why not take one battleship now, which confessedly can not be built and completed for three years, and which at the end of another 10 or 12 years will deteriorate so fast that it will be almost a useless junk heap at that time.

Conceding that this House will compromise on one battleship, why not take the other $15,000,000, not all in a lump, of course, but extending over years to come as occasion demands, to develop this new means of national defense and national attack by buying aeroplanes? Do you know what that $15,000,000 will do? It will buy 1,000 of the most improved up-to-date aeroplanes that are made to-day in Europe or in this country. In addition to that, it will provide the five centers of aviation which this voluminous report of the Secretary of War recommends to be established on our Atlantic seacoast, along the Great Lakes, and the Pacific slope. It will establish needed schools of aviation. It will build what is more necessary to-day than any other one improvement as affecting the development of this science—it will build a great aeronautic laboratory, of which there exist many in Europe. By connecting that laboratory with the Smithsonian Institution we shall be able to better find out the conditions of the atmosphere, the difficulties that we will have to overcome, and to provide for safety in making flights. I fear sometimes that too many of our people look upon the aeroplane as a sort of a toy, a box-kite affair, but it is one of the most practical things that is in existence to-day considering the time since it was discovered and the difficulties to be overcome. Upon its practicability let me quote from

Capt. W. I. Chambers, of the United States Navy, who recently said:

> There are officers in the Navy to-day who look upon naval aviation as farcical, because they do not yet know that an instrument can be provided by which an aeroplane may be navigated out of sight from a ship at sea, with a reasonable surety of being able to go where sent and to return to the ship that sent her. * * *
> In my opinion, aviation will soon be as safe as automobiling, and its sphere of usefulness will be extended far beyond the limits of good roads.

That comes from a gentleman who is preeminently qualified to speak of the adaptability and feasibility of establishing the aeroplane both as a naval resource and an aid to the Army.

Mr. CONNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAYDEN). Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SHARP. I will.

Mr. CONNELL. In view of the statement by the committee that the present situation in the Navy is that it needs auxiliary attendants rather than battleships, would the gentleman recommend that the money be spent buying ships of the air rather than cruisers and colliers to serve the ships that we already have?

Mr. SHARP. I could easily effect a compromise with the gentleman on that proposition, because the amount of money involved for aeroplanes would be so absolutely insignificant. Why, we have not $75,000 now invested in Government-owned aeroplanes to-day in existence. Two hundred thousand dollars would duplicate three times over our present equipment of aeroplanes. It is too insignificant to talk about. It has no comparison in the outlay required with the expenditure of the vast sum which you ask us to appropriate for these instruments of destruction, battleships, and so forth.

Passing on to the second phase of my subject, there is an alluring prospect in the commercial field of the development of aeroplanes. The first theorem in my geometry at school as I remember was the proposition that the shortest distance between two points is a straight line. That was the first proposition, because it was so axiomatic, so plainly apparent and evident, that the simplest mind could understand its demonstration. But, gentlemen, it is in some respects the most basic, the most fundamental. Why, do you know that the transportation corporations of this country, the railway and steamship companies, have spent hundreds of millions of dollars in trying to carry their freight along a straight line between two points?

In doing that they have had to level mountains, dig great tunnels, dredge deep channels, build expensive canals, and still they have attained the purpose only to a modified extent. They have had to cross great chasms with expensive bridges, some of them more than a mile in length, to reach and attain the shortest distance between two points. But can you conceive such a problem as that to a man who can ignore the natural obstacles on the surface of the earth? He has the ability to go over valleys, to fly aloft over mountains, over chasms, and over the ocean. There is really no topographical obstacle which he can not overcome. He has to set no expensive telegraph or telephone poles, no expensive right of way to acquire.

Awhile ago I had the opportunity, in the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill upon this floor, to propose an amendment appropriating $50,000 for carrying the mail by aeroplane. I think some of my friends were too kindly disposed toward me, too magnanimous to smile at some of my statements favoring the measure. But it is coming. The questions relating to navigation of the air are going to engage the attention and call for regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Post Office Department, just as the transportation problems involved in carrying freight and mail by water and rail are to be met.

Already in this city there is planned an immense aeroplane with a 100-foot spread. I went to the factory a number of weeks ago and saw, ready for shipment, an aeroplane with a spread of many feet. It was built upon the cantilever plan that it might better resist the buckling effect of sudden air pressure, and I am pleased to say, in behalf of the people of the city of Washington, that it was designed and constructed by one of its citizens, Dr. Christmas, who was a pioneer in this investigation. Within the next few days, I understand, he is going to attempt to carry several hundred pounds of mail from New York City down to the Capital City of Washington without making a stop. Within another year such feats will be very commonplace. Only last week Count Zeppelin delivered to the German Government a dirigible balloon of great size, capable of carrying many passengers. On trial tests it had sustained itself in the air without alighting, making all sorts of maneuvers, going around the north part of Germany for 10 hours, at a speed of 45 miles an hour. The speed attained by the aeroplane is already in excess of 100 miles an hour. Even with a small, birdlike aeroplane, 11 people at a time have been carried up in the air. It would be a mistake on my part to attempt to tell of to-day's record in aeronautics, because events crowd one another so much that it is almost impossible to keep pace with the progress made. The record of ascent of 13,000 feet above the earth will soon be far exceeded, and I believe that the speed of 100 miles an hour will be increased by 50 per cent in time. Poor Vaniman told me a few weeks before his tragic death that he expected to cross the Atlantic in his great dirigible. Though he died a martyr to his faith before it could be accomplished, yet others will do it in half the time the ocean grey hounds now take.

Is it dangerous? Naturally so. But do you know that whereas we have had two deaths at College Park, yet there have been 1,500 flights made? Do you realize that, with all of the deaths and accidents of which we have read, there have been over 250,000 flights made by the aeroplane? The deaths from accidents mostly happen where a man gets high compensation for doing daring things. I doubt whether the record of mortality is nearly as great as it has been with the automobile. So much for the commercial phases of aviation.

My time is fast passing, and I am going to conclude with just a few observations which, I must confess, come from somewhat of a crank upon a few scientific subjects. We say that every man has a hobby or should have, and I have mine. I have been deeply interested in the possibilities of aviation. This interest was greatly increased from witnessing the impressive feats of Wilbur Wright at Fort Meyer several years ago. Wilbur Wright should have a monument which would reach to the skies. [Applause.] America, first, is proud of Wilbur Wright, and Ohio is especially proud of her native citizen. For all time to come, it seems to me, there will be no names that will shine quite so brightly in her hall of fame for the laying of the foundation of actual achievement in many future kinds of industry and of scientific research as those of Wilbur and Orville Wright. [Applause.]

The other day I was interested in reading an article in one of our magazines having to do in part with the discovery of the aeroplane. In compliment to the magazines of the country let me say that I do not know of a single agency which has contributed more to the progress and advancement of the American people than the monthly magazines.

Only a few years ago, if you went into a bookstore or to a news stand, you had a choice of only one of a half dozen magazines. To-day you would have to take Dr. Eliot's 5-foot bookcase, extend it, making it sectional, and then run across it several times to accommodate the hundred or more monthly magazines that are published. In the Popular Mechanics Magazine for the present month—and I commend it to the attention of everyone—there is a most interesting lot of articles, one of which refers particularly to the phase of my subject which I am about to discuss. There was sent abroad, all over the world, by its editor, to approximately 1,000 of the greatest scientists, a list of 56 recent discoveries, and they were asked as to what constituted, in their opinion, the greatest seven wonders. I will read the result of that vote in the order in which the votes were cast. Wireless seemed to be the most popular, then came in the order named the telephone, the aeroplane, radium, antiseptics and antitoxin, the spectrum analysis, and the X-ray.

Archimedes, the ancient mechanician of Syracuse, who was celebrated in his day, once exclaimed in his enthusiasm in regard to the power of the lever, "Give me a fulcrum on which to rest and I will move the earth." That fulcrum has been supplied by the scientific men of the twentieth century, and, figuratively speaking, they are moving the earth. In comparison with the seven wonders of ancient days, which are of no utility to man, compare the possibilities, the potentialities for good to man in any one of these other enumerated discoveries. If you will analyze these discoveries you will find that although the aeroplane, the cause of which I am championing to-day, has been placed third on the list, every one of those subjects, except antiseptics and antitoxin, is intimately connected with what may come from aeroplane research——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHARP. Just a few more minutes.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be granted 10 minutes additional to conclude his remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHARP. Appreciating the fact, gentlemen, that there are others who wish to speak, I thank you very much for the courtesy, and 10 minutes will be all I ask; and in this connection, lest I forget it, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHARP. The world a few years ago was startled by the discovery of a mere boy over in Italy when he announced that he was able to send messages through the air without the use of a wire. It is interesting to read an account of how he first came to discover the properties of wireless telegraphy, if I may call it by that name. Marconi at the age of 15 was already a scientist and an expert in the knowledge of electricity. But wireless, telephone, radium, the spectrum analysis, the X ray, even light itself, owe their power of manifestation to what? Why, to the fact there is a medium which scientists call ether, through which these waves are conveyed. Without that medium there could not have been made known to us a single attribute of the solar energy, the phenomena of the great sun—the producer of all our energy; take from this earth the ether itself and we could not have any communication of the electric current; we could not have any communication of the light waves that travel 186,300 miles a second. The contributor of the article on the discovery of the wireless states that it is a similar wave which sends a current on the wings of the air to the light waves.

The real merit of the discovery of the Roentgen, or the X ray, lies in the fact that the X rays are not natural in actual existence but light waves are. Through all these ages man has been in the condition of a bird in a cage, confined to the surface of the earth. Given a little more stability and safety in the field of aviation, when the scientist can mount above the clouds with his finely constructed instruments, I predict here and now, gentlemen of the House, that almost at every ascent he will discover new conditions in regard to the science of meteorology; that he will acquire a vastly increased knowledge of the properties of this mysterious ether, and even of the silent but all-powerful forces of gravity and magnetic action. Let me tell you of a very astounding incident, if I may say that anything in this great age of discovery is any longer astounding. A gentleman who had his aeroplane at the Minneola field, the other day told me of an incident that out-Verned Jules Verne in its strangeness. He said that a gentleman who had been conducting investigations along certain scientific lines came up to his machine and fastened upon one side of it a little instrument occupying less than a cubic foot in space, and then he said to the pilot, "When you have gotten up several hundred feet in the air with your machine I will wave my handkerchief and then I want you to press this button upon the little instrument."

Just before this he had gone several hundred feet away, and in a little excavation in the earth he placed some powder, after which it was covered over with several inches of dirt. When the machine arose several hundred feet in height he waved his handkerchief, the operator pressed the button, and this powder ignited. Is there anything stranger in the realm of dreams than that? Is there any wonder that the gentleman who built that machine asked, after that incident, "What is to prevent your blowing up any magazine when you fly up in the air and send down that mysterious current"? And the reply was that it could be done if the instrument was sufficiently powerful and properly attuned.

To illustrate another manner in which this substance of ether, if I may call it a substance, communicates light waves let me close with an incident which I wish to relate. A number of years ago a friend of mine having a summer home on Lake Geneva, near the Yerkes Observatory, which has a telescope containing one of the largest glasses in the world—one of the great things that street-car magnate did for the cause of science—knowing my interest in astronomy, accompanied me to that observatory. Covered over with a piece of oilcloth, looking in form much like a gigantic swan of perhaps 3 or 4 feet in height and that many feet in length, resting on the floor beneath the great dome, was a strange-looking object, or would have been had the cover been removed.

And yet not all the wonders contained in Pandora's box could rival the mysterious powers of this apparatus. Possessing the ability to photograph the most distant stars and to analyze their spectrums, the innermost secrets of the physical construction of those luminous suns have been laid as an open book before the inquisitive scientist. Is it, indeed, any wonder that the spectrum analysis should have been chosen as one of the seven most celebrated discoveries? What more strange than for man to be able to tell with unerring accuracy the component parts—the very elements—which compose not only our own sun, but those of every other luminous astral body; nay, even more, to be able, by the shifting of those spectral lines, to tell their motions in space and even their weight from their gravitational pull! Indeed, must I exclaim, not how little but how great is man! And, after all, is it not the power which he possesses to solve the mysteries of creation which stamps him with the impress akin to Divinity itself? It would almost seem as though only a better understanding of the truths of psychology is needed to establish man's connection with that Power.

Mr. Speaker, it is because of my firm conviction that through the practical investigations which we can carry on by a further development of the science of aviation we shall achieve most important results along the lines I have discussed that I stand here to-day advocating that in every possible way the Government stand behind and encourage this new field of discovery.

It is with this thought and with this purpose that I have asked the kind indulgence of my colleagues upon this floor, and if it may result in some agitation, in some examination of a subject that is so comparatively new, I shall feel amply repaid for my efforts. [Applause.]

Mr. FERGUSSON rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. FERGUSSON] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Speaker, I was surprised when I heard the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] accuse Woodrow Wilson of deliberate insincerity in his present advocacy of progressive principles, especially the initiative and the referendum. He charged Woodrow Wilson with having insincerely adopted the progressive principles, now so universally demanded by the great mass of the common people, not as being for the common good, but solely for the purpose of attaining high political position.

Doubtless we should judge leniently the contortions of our friends on that side of the aisle. They are in a perplexing dilemma—what to do to be saved. Follow the bull moose, crazed as he is with the rabies of reckless ambition, with menacing front and nostrils belching flames, headed no telling where, or follow the bull elephant who moves not at all except as he is pulled by the iron hook of the trainer?

It is exasperating, and we draw the curtain of charity over the scene.

But the false charge has induced me, gentleman, to attempt in a modest way, partly in justification of myself and of the Democrats and Progressive Republicans of my State, for having enlisted in behalf of these principles, to state the reasons that have moved us, and partly because a statement of the reason and necessity for those principles will justify, if not require, all patriotic men to join in putting them in force. And I doubt not they are the reasons that have moved our Democratic candidate, in common with other distinguished men of both parties of this Republic, to demand so much of change as should be made in our ancient laws under a representative government, as will restore real, pure representative government as our forefathers intended it to be and as it prevailed in our country for more than 100 years; that change to be made in the direction of giving more power—no; not more power than was given under our original form of government, but the same power as existed from the beginning of our Government—by enacting laws, according to progressive principles, that will give direct and immediate control to the people over the acts of their representatives, as well as such control over their representatives themselves, to the end that injurious laws may be quickly annulled, good laws readily forced in the statute books, and unworthy public servants quickly deprived of power. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Woodrow Wilson, in the seclusion of his educational and scholastic life, in a great history, which has received the commendation of the whole people, enunciated certain views as to the then new principles of the initiative and the referendum. He had in view the historical fact that up to a period decades subsequent to the Civil War, and before collective wealth had become so powerful, so brazen, so insatiable, and so corrupt, and at a time when the astounding developments consequent upon the alliance, the close partnership and cooperation in this country, between corrupt politicians and treacherous representatives of the people, on the one hand, and corrupt and overpowering wealth, on the other, had not yet become fully manifest. What has caused this change in every patriotic man who loves his country, who wants to preserve these principles in their original vigor, as intended by the fathers, is the absolute necessity of preventing the degeneration of our beneficent people's government into a government by a plutocracy; because, by the power of great wealth, by the conscienceless, corrupt, and selfish use of the power of great wealth, the special interests have perverted our original representative government, as created by our fathers, and changed it into a government by representatives of wealthy men and trusts. Laws have been made, laws have been administered, and laws have been construed by the courts for the further enrichment of the few and to the pitiful impoverishment and misery of the plain people, as Lincoln lovingly called them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If Wilson has changed, as has "with such spirit and decency" been charged against him by the gentleman from Illinois, he is in most distinguished company. Look at the names of patriotic, courageous men now in the Senate, now in this House, now in high office in all the States, who are engaged with him in the task of overthrowing this deplorable domination of wealth in our country, not, as charged with conscious falsity, by destroying representative government, but by restoring and safeguarding representative government.

Before the rise of corporate wealth, immediately succeeding the great Civil War; before it had grown so great and so strong and, by long use, had corrupted its possessors; in the early times of this Republic, such a thing as a corrupt representative was unknown; such a thing as a judge on the bench doing aught but expounding the law impartially, had not been dreamed of; such a thing as a councilman in a city being purchased to grant a franchise without compensation to the public, say, to some powerful syndicate to build a street railway, so that it should be oppressive to the people and give undue wealth to the possessors of the franchise, was incredible; before legislators, men composing the legislatures of the States, and, I am sorry to say, in the general belief of the people, at least, before men in the high position of Senators of the United States, openly used their power in high office to pass laws for the benefit of the special interests, for the benefit of men who have forgotten patriotism and have become slaves to the passion of avarice, the necessity for these remedies had not, I say, become manifest. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The moral side of the use of the initiative, the referendum, the recall, and the depriving legislatures of the power of electing United States Senators, should not be overlooked.

What wealthy man, think you, or syndicate, would expend large sums of money to buy a legislature or a board of aldermen to pass a law or ordinance giving vast profit to the bribers, to the great disadvantage of the public, if by law the people could at once repeal such law or ordinance under a referendum? Likewise, the initiative would tend to discourage the corrupt use of money to prevent the enactment of good laws by legislators; and the recall would destroy the value of corrupt judges in the estimation of bribers. The public servants would be relieved of temptation. The all-wise prayer says, "Deliver us from temptation"; and the human wisdom of Bobby Burns shines resplendent in these lines:

I say na mankind are villains a';
The real, hardened wicked,
That ha nae check but human law,
Are to a few restricted;
But ach, mankind is unco weak,
And little to be trusted,
If self the wav'ring balance shake,
It's rarely right adjusted.

It is statesmanship to adjust government to changed conditions in the evolution of things. Change, in itself, is not bad. Evolution is change. The reactionary would stay all change. It is well that the boy ceased to carry grain to the mill with rocks in the other end of the bag; and we know now that Darius Green, with his flying machine, was not such a fool after all. The motto of the reactionary, "Once a fool, always a fool," is not a good motto. The changes in the science of medicine, of communication, of transportation, in the use of steam and electricity, are all good things; and the changes in human government, freedom of conscience, freedom of thought, free speech, are good things. The sine qua non in changes in human government, in solving the problems of government now confronting us as a nation, is honest men in charge for the people—men of learning, as far as possible—and in the chief place of power a man of deep insight into the science of human government, like Jefferson; of unconquerable resolution, like Jackson; and of broad humanity, like Lincoln. We offer the people Woodrow Wilson, whose public utterances suggest the intellectual grasp of Jefferson, and whose acts as governor of a great State have shown at once the prompt courage of Jackson and the solicitude of Lincoln, to make secure the rights of the common people under a government of the people, by the people, for the people.

The very foundation of our Government was intended to change the awful evils of government that existed in Europe at the end of the eighteenth century, under the monarchical system, and to erect on this side of the Atlantic a government whose prime object was to care for, protect, and make happy the humble and lowly of mankind. The French Revolution was produced by the selfishness of wealth, its heartlessness, and its forgetfulness of the masses of the poor.

Let us indulge a brief review, that is intended to show that under our system of government such a change of point of view was to be expected from the rise and the great power of concentrated wealth; that such a change has taken place in very recent years; that Woodrow Wilson, if at first he proclaimed that the initiative and the referendum were not needed, stood with all the patriots in the one hundred and more years of our history until corporate organizations and trusts began to form in the last three or four decades. He stood with all of those from Jefferson down to Jackson, and on down through the great list of statesmen who administered the powers conferred upon them as representatives of the people, honestly, as intended, in the interest of the people. But with the change of conditions that came with the great growth of wealth, with its power, with its aggression, with its absolutely corrupt heart, the change of opinion came, and with Wilson, if change you will call it, other honorable men have changed.

The greatest speech made by the late Senator Dolliver, in my judgment, was the last one he made on the floor of the Senate, not long before he died, in which in his place in the Senate—and he had been in politics many years—he, in effect, said:

I wash my hands of the methods of this party.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

He added, in substance:

The powers of government have been seized by corporate and selfish wealth. They have been taken away from the people and prostituted to the enrichment of the mercenary wealthy; and for the future—

He said—

I shall devote my life to the correction of the evils that have grown up under our system of government.

He died in a belief in the necessity of the initiative, the referendum, and the recall. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We can count on our fingers prominent Senators and Representatives, both Democrats and Republicans, who believe in these principles; and if you will note, you will see that the States that have been most corrupt, like California; most under the dominion of special interests, like Oregon; most under the control of those who have selfishly perverted the great powers of the people vested in themselves, as representatives, to unworthy uses, you will see that everybody is for the initiative, the referendum, the recall, direct primaries, and for every other one of the great progressive principles that have been found necessary, not to destroy representative government, but to restore it to its pristine vigor and purity, as it was intended to be. [Applause on Democratic side.]

The fathers of our Republic were men learned in history; they knew of the results to the masses of mankind of irresponsible power exercised by the few over the many, as was apparent to the world in France, for example, in 1776. They were likewise men of great humanity, whose hearts swelled with sympathy for the helpless misery of the millions of men under the monarchies of Europe. They fully shared the aspirations for individual liberty of the European writers who were even then pleading for liberty and sowing the seeds of the French Revolution.

Finding themselves, as colonists, freed from the domination of England and confronted with the task of founding a government based on the principles set forth in the immortal Declaration of Independence, on which they had won freedom, they established our constitutional form of government, a representative government, in which the power of the people, supreme, was to be exercised through servants or representatives chosen by the people for short, stated periods of time; and the delegated power, while vested in these servants or officers or representatives, was to be exercised only for the benefit of the people themselves. The power of the people, however, was to remain in the people and be supreme, and short terms of office were provided for by the first law in order that the people might often use their power.

The fundamental principles embodied in the phrases the referendum, the initiative, and the recall have, from the foundation of our Government, in some form, modified or remote, been recognized in our Constitution and laws. The recall is in force in that every office, save and except the judges appointed for life, is for a specific length of time, and at the end of that term the officer is recalled by operation of law into the body of the people and becomes subject to the power of the people whether they will return him to power or make his recall permanent.

The reference, or referendum, of all amendments to constitutions and of certain laws and municipal ordinances to a vote of the people has always been the law and practice. But in a broader or indirect sense the referendum has always been in force in that all legislative officers or representatives have served for stated terms, and their acts while in office have been indirectly referred to the people for approval or repeal by subjecting the representative to reelection or recall by the people. In this way the Payne-Aldrich tariff law has been subjected to, and condemned by, a referendum, and this Democratic House is the result; and it has been unmistakably directed to repeal that law. [Applause.]

In a still more remote and indirect way the people have from the beginning initiated laws. Heretofore, and until within the last two or three decades, when, in some States, direct laws have been enacted, the power of the people to initiate laws was exercised through the force of public opinion. Even though at the end of a bloody war, yet, in its ultimate analysis, the abolition of slavery was brought about by public opinion; the control of railroad rates, through the Interstate Commerce Commission and other like great enactments, has come about in response to that great power called public opinion. But that power, that means of enforcing the will of the people, is slow, is easily thwarted by thimbleriggers, and is often so tedious in its effects that sufferings are terribly prolonged, and intolerable evils become well-nigh ineradicable. As the result of long use, we even hear the hateful hint of vested rights, as invoked in behalf of oppressive, unjust tariff wrongs; that forsooth, from long use, it has become a right vested in overwealthy manufacturers to tax the earnings of the day laborers and the consumers to still further and perpetually enrich the tariff beneficiaries, a vested right, in one class, to tax another class of our citizens.

Here arises the demand for the initiative, the referendum, and the recall, as advocated and partially adopted in our time. It is simply the demand of the people, voiced in a large and rapidly growing public opinion, that their power to control their affairs shall be made by law more easily effective. They demand the right to veto the acts of their representatives in lawmaking bodies by having such laws referred at once to a vote for their approval or rejection; they demand the right to inaugurate or initiate a new law by direct vote in case their chosen representatives are corruptly influenced to refuse or neglect to carry out their will; and they demand the right to recall before the recurrence of the next election any corrupt judge, or at the very least to make the present difficult, if not useless, impeachment laws easily and readily responsive to their will.

Now, when and why originated this demand—this sullen, portentous unrest among the masses of our countrymen; these mutterings, even so deep and despairing as to suggest the awful sufferings in France that preceded the French Revolution? Do not close your eyes to what is visible all around you, you pampered beneficiaries of unjust laws, you malefactors of great wealth, you special-privilege holders, with your monkey dinners and your poodle-dog receptions, your divorce courts, reeking with the records of your idle, indecent lives. [Applause.] The people observe these things and contrast such pictures with the miserable exhibits we have lately seen in the Halls of this very Congress in the form of emaciated little boys and girls, pale young women, looking prematurely old, and poorly clad, all with the shrinking, hunted look of the beleaguered wild animal; and angry men, with the dangerous gleam in their eyes—of resentment at intolerable wrongs, long suffered—all coming from the woolen mills of Lawrence, Mass., one of the proprietors of which mills, I am told, has amassed wealth to the amount of probably $100,000,000 in the last 30 years through the operation of laws enacted by virtue of the conspiracy existing between corrupt, grasping, conscienceless wealth and the complaisant, if not corrupted, representatives of the people. [Applause.]

How many franchises for public-utility purposes, oppressive in their provisions, have been granted in cities to special interests by aldermen corrupted to pass them, without compensation to the public; made invincible by the decisions of the courts that they are vested rights, clothed with the sanctity of contracts, the obligations of which are constitutionally protected from the power of the people? How many laws of States have been enacted by legislatures that have surrendered to the blandishments of wealthy men and corporations—malefactors of great wealth, as Roosevelt calls them? How many laws have been passed by Congress itself in the last 30 years or so in return for campaign contributions?

The Representatives of the people, in some instances voting for such laws, though they were at the time personally interested in the corporations and trusts, the beneficiaries of such laws—have enacted laws that have produced the harmful contrast of conditions existing at this moment—for example, in the woolen factories in New England. Did Carnegie earn his half billion or more of dollars in 40 years; or did he get the lion's share of the taxes from the people, under the guise of providing revenue to carry on the Government and protect our infant industries?

These are some of the reasons why the people are demanding the initiative, the referendum, the recall, direct primaries, the election of Senators by direct vote of the people, and all those so-called progressive principles, principles which long since permeated the Democratic party, which have riven the Republican ship from stem to stern, and which are as sure to triumph as it is certain that this scheme of government, conceived by our forefathers, is too young to die. [Applause.]

The birth of these principles was coincident with the beginning and growth of unrest among the people; and the beginning and growth of unrest among the people began and kept pace with the beginning and growth of corporate, selfish, and corrupt wealth. The keen, statesmanlike mind of Bryan, his patriotism, his indomitable courage, his unflagging devotion to conviction, his fortitude under misrepresentation, contumely, and abuse, and his eloquent tongue and pen, have at last made certain that representative government, which has been destroyed by the activities and power and corrupt use of great wealth, will be restored in our country; and under Woodrow Wilson's administration the fervid prayer, known as Lincoln's Gettysburg address, will be answered, and "a government of the people, by the people, and for the people" will be in force once more, for the continued enlightenment of all the nations of the earth, and for the protection, equal rights, equal opportunities, and equitably distributed happiness of our people. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, in the unanimous absence of our friends on the other side, who, I understand, have just heard the astonishing announcement that William Howard Taft has accepted the nomination at Chicago, about which we have heard so much of late, I think I may take this opportunity, especially since gentlemen on this side of the House are present in such enthusiastic and overwhelming numbers, to say something on a subject which I am sure interests everybody here and which may interest a few people elsewhere. That is as to when this Congress is going to adjourn. They are discussing this matter in various parts of the country, and in case the question should arise in the coming campaign as to why we did not adjourn sooner, you will find that there will be some people who will blame the House of Representatives for it. Therefore I have taken the floor simply for the purpose of reading an editorial paragraph which I hold in my hand. I do so with pleasure, because it is refreshing to find a great metropolitan newspaper which goes to the bottom of things, takes up the facts, and gives them to the country. In reading this I mean no reflection upon the Senate, because they may have good reason for their delay; but I want the House to be put right in the matter, and this seems to me to do it. I read from the New York World of this morning:

> In a burst of partisanship the Tribune denounces as "disgraceful" the conduct of the House, and says that "with any degree of diligence most of the appropriation bills should have passed the House before the end of March." If it will look at the calendar it will find that eight of them did, and that most of them were held up two months in the Senate, some longer. In addition, the Indian bill was passed by the House April 9, by the Senate not until July 17; the Post-Office bill by the House May 2, by the Senate not reported until July 23, and still to be passed. The Military Academy and naval bills were passed by the House the last week in May, and on July 24 and July 5, respectively, by the Senate. The Army bill passed the House July 2, and has not yet been reported to the Senate. Why not stick to facts?

[Applause.]

As I said, I mean no reflection upon anyone else; but if I had the time to follow up the question I would like to put before this House some reasons why the facts have not been adhered to in considering and discussing the bills that have gone from this House and the work of this Democratic majority. But the time is coming when these things will be discussed in every corner of the Republic. When that time does come, with our candidate for the presidency shedding the light of learning upon every public question, we will show that in all the history of this branch of the Government, with all its fame and distinction, there never has been a better or a more representative assemblage of American citizens to deal with public questions, or who did it more honestly or more firmly or more effectively or more quickly than this House has done it. With this record we go before the people, and upon our banners must perch the great reward of those who have been faithful to public duty intrusted to their hands. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on two subjects—that of homesteads and the control of drawbridges by local jurisdiction.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Mr. BURLESON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, it has been but a few days since this House passed a bill to create a commission on industrial relations, with a life limited to three years. I voted for the bill because it was a step in the right direction. It was, however, a feeble step. I do not expect that commission to do much more than many others that were created in about the same way. Had I known in advance that the bill would be presented at that time I should have been prepared with some amendments to propose. Since then I have introduced a resolution the purpose of which is to secure a committee of this House as a permanent institution, its purpose being to report on bills involving social problems. My resolution, which was introduced July 18, I submit as a part of my remarks. It is as follows:

House resolution 636.

Whereas it is among the declared purposes of our Government to establish justice and insure domestic tranquillity and to promote the general welfare; and

Whereas there is a persistent and irrepressible economic conflict now everywhere manifest in the economies of production and distribution between those who own the principal means, appliances, and materials of socialized production and distribution, on the one hand, and the smaller owner and those who perform the social service, manual and mental, on the other, and since said conflict, unless soon reconciled, threatens to overthrow all social order: Therefore, among other important facts relating to the same, it is important to know—

(a) That it is a fact that the production of permanent, material, capitalistic wealth for speculative and remote future use is so great that in its production and maintenance it robs the industrial forces engaged and consumes the material resources required to produce the urgent necessaries of the present day and generation. On that account there is now insufficient production and distribution of the things necessary to supply the common needs, and therefore most people are in want of many of the actual necessaries. This condition is largely caused by the overgrowth of the larger cities in this and other countries and by the construction of systems of canals, railways, buildings, and other permanent structures, many of which are built solely for the investment of capital, while instead the energy of labor and the use of capital and machinery should be employed in the promotion of industries with the main purpose of supplying the necessaries for the people's use, convenience, and well-being. The people's energies and the material substances are being thus used to provide capital with permanent investment. In this way capital is created from the material resources, and is supplemented by the great wealth that labor adds, but it is controlled by a few individuals whose direct purpose is to use it as a basis on which to collect interest, dividends, and maintenance cost from the people. The cost of living can not be reduced and conditions materially bettered so long as so much of the natural resources and energies are employed to produce profits regardless of the service to be secured.

(b) That it is an economic fact that interest, rent, and dividend indebtedness levied on the present basis are partly made up by enforcing longer days of labor and reducing wages, partly by deduction from the price of the farmer's products when he sells, partly by increasing the price of the necessaries of life that must be purchased by the consumers; but even in all these ways rents, dividends, and interest at the rates charged can not all be paid, because it is impossible to pay in full, and therefore bankruptcy will be constantly in process and the scale of living low for the majority so long as we follow this system. Interest compounded on the large capitalized holdings of wealth at the rates commonly charged equals in a few years all the country's resources. Under such a system periodical panics are bound to occur. The people can not be prosperous under any government that permits a business policy and practice that eventually leads them to bankruptcy. Since our Government now permits and encourages special credit advantages in favor of invested capital that obligates the people to pay its owners higher interest, rent, and dividends than it is possible for them to pay, property is given a more secure status than personal rights, and much property is being produced for the purpose of appropriating the energy of the masses for the profit of the few. Under such practices all but the favored few suffer.

(c) That it is a fact that discriminations exist in our social organization, sometimes practiced privately and sometimes publicly, giving special favors to individuals, concerns, and localities without economic reason therefor. This in itself creates inequality and increases the common burdens.

(d) That it is an economic fact that the burden of production rests on the toilers, mental and manual, whether they be on the farm, in the factory, in the store, or engaged in the sale or distribution of the commodities of commerce, or otherwise. They support and maintain all social institutions, whether these pertain to production for present or future use, and whether such production furnishes necessaries, pleasures, supplies, or other conditions of life. There is no other source from which the necessaries and conveniences may be economically secured. Capital, even after accumulated, can not maintain itself, but depends upon labor for its value and conservation. Even money and credit furnish no material substance, but merely express a convenient measure of exchange used because of the fiat supported by the fact that it is accepted in terms of exchange. The cost of living is increased by all persons who are engaged in any work of unnecessary duplication; also by those occupied in producing things that are not required for the present or future of the living generation or naturally incident to the establishment of practical working conditions where more permanent construction is necessary. Any undertaking which does not have for its purpose the production of conditions that produce the necessaries, conveniences, or luxuries practical to be enjoyed, or for use by the people generally, or in their distribution, sale, and exchange, increases the cost of living. Fellow workers in all useful and necessary pursuits are coordinate, and are cooperators and not competitors under economically governed conditions. Those only are competitors who consume without producing an equivalent, either in producing the necessaries or in their distribution, sale, and exchange. It is an economic fact that modern machinery, new methods, and better appliances have enormously increased the productive energy of the people. Therefore, if economic order governed in the production and distribution of things necessary, convenient, and desirable, there is ample means by which all industrious people can secure all things reasonable and desirable to make them successful. This can be done by very much shorter days of labor than are now being expended by most people in order to work out what proves a burdensome existence under present conditions. It can not, however, be accomplished while each individual pursues indiscriminately this, that, or the other purpose in life without special or even general information that the undertaking fits into any real need. Naturally, under the disorder that exists, there is an enormous waste of energy and resources, and some will be idle while the majority will be overworked, underpaid, and therefore deprived of the advantages to which the industrious are entitled. None would lose by creating order out of the present disorder, but all would gain by the elimination of waste and wanton extravagance.

(e) That it is a fact that corporations have been organized to overcome some of the disorders that have been common in business. But these, in most cases, are trusts, and operate for extremely selfish purposes. The public derives little benefit from their existence, but on the contrary in some cases is actually injured. The trusts have been able to systematize and practice economy in the cost of production and distribution, but, since they are monopolies, the public has not had a proper advantage from their formation. On the contrary the trusts have used the monopoly to reduce prices when they buy from the original producers and increase them when they sell to the consumer. They build up colossal fortunes—commonly called vested capital—for the individuals who control them. On these fortunes the public is charged annual compound interest, rent, and dividends. Experience teaches the managers of the trusts that they may cooperate to their mutual business profit, and therefore there is a community of interest between them. But there is no community of interest between the trusts and the public except in the sense that there is a community of interest between the farmer and his team or his cows.

(f) That it is a fact that in this country there are natural conditions, resources, and advantages sufficient to satisfy and supply every human need under economically governed use and application of our industrial forces in their development. People have the intelligence required to bring about better conditions if they will make the effort. The problem is to direct things in a way to prevent waste of energy and resources in the production of things unnecessary and to exert more energy in the production of the necessaries, and otherwise reconcile the present industrial conflict in a manner which will bring about a reasonable adjustment; and that may be done without any great change in the fundamental principles of government, or even interfering with the system of the individual initiative: Now, therefore, because of the imperative necessity to form a general social and business policy that shall be consistent with the great common interests of the people, to insure independence and equality of opportunity so far as it is practical, and to provide a social order of things that will economize in energy and material to bring about a reduction in the cost of living and in the general burdens that now encumber the plain producers and consumers; to increase the advantages of the people in all ways practical, as well as to induce other countries to enter into like undertakings to lessen the burdens of all people: Be it

Resolved, That there shall be added to the present standing committees of the House of Representatives a Committee on Industrial Relations, which shall consist of 15 members, to be selected by the House from the Members thereof, and to which shall be referred all bills and proposed acts of Congress affecting or proposing to affect the industrial affairs of the United States not referable under the rules of the House to any of the present standing committees thereof, and, in addition thereto, all bills and proposed acts of Congress reported from the present standing Committees on Ways and Means, Banking and Currency, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Railways and Canals, and Labor for consideration, correlation, and report to the House as to the effect of such proposed legislation on industrial conditions generally.

I have observed that when one states the plain truth he is designated as a radical; that is, if the subject matter on which his statement is made has to do with politics or economics. For the same reason I have been designated as a radical. I was so called even before I introduced this last resolution, as may be observed by an article in the New York Evening Post of July 20, 1912, the last paragraph of which reads as follows:

Representative LINDBERGH has the reputation in Washington of being a radical, but he has also a reputation for getting things in which he is interested accomplished. In the case of his Money Trust resolution of a year ago he asserted at the time that he selected summer as the propitious moment to plant the thought in the consciousness of the public. Events proved that the seed grew and bore fruit. It is possible—and it would be characteristic of Representative LINDBERGH if this proved to be the case—that the idea outlined above, properly watered by its author, and persistently advertised by him, may have equal chances of success.

The Evening Post, in referring to the "idea outlined above," referred to the comment it made on my resolution for the appointment of a committee on industrial relations.

It is well known that my Money Trust resolution was opposed by the Money Trust and by most of the politicians. But the country insisted on its passage, and after I had fought for it a year the chairman of the Rules Committee, Mr. HENRY of Texas, substituted a resolution of his own to take the place of mine, substantially the same. It was practical and wise for him to do that, because his Democratic colleagues wanted the Democratic Party to get the credit for starting the Money Trust investigation. He thereby removed much opposition, and the Money Trust investigation was arranged for. This new resolution for a committee on industrial relations that I introduced is equally important. I expect considerable opposition to it, and therefore volunteer to let any Democrat adopt it as his if that will secure for it more support. My main purpose is to have the people obtain the benefit that I am sure would result from its adoption. The fact that I am the author is not any more important in this case than it was in the other.

I do not wish my colleagues to understand me as expressing the opinion that we can suddenly change to a true economic basis—that is, one which should have been followed from the beginning of our social and political institutions. We can not do that after generations of practices, many of which are economically bad, but to which we have adjusted ourselves and our institutions. No sane thinking person with a fair knowledge of conditions would advocate that. But we can adjust to what is now a true economic basis, fixed by the relations of things as they are. Above all things we are entitled to know the truth, and should understand what is our condition and what we ought to do. The great advantage the so-called special interests have over us is that the majority of us do not understand the economics or energy and business.

In the recitals of my resolution I have not attempted to enumerate more than a few of the causes that contribute to the high cost of living. It seems to me that the principal reasons for high prices are little understood. When understood there will be less complaint about high prices, but greater effort will be put forth to find a remedy.

Everyone knows that the cost of necessaries is a vitally important problem. Our actual needs must be supplied before we can do anything to advantage. To aid our understanding in this investigation, it is only necessary to observe the things that are going on all around. There we will find evidences that should aid us in forming practical conclusions. We daily require food, clothing, shelter, and so forth. These are prime necessaries and should be obtained by everybody with as little expenditure as possible. All practices that make it difficult to obtain them should be removed.

The methods employed to conduct general business and the deportment of our Government create conditions that make equality of opportunity impossible. Unfortunately, inequality is born into the world. The world itself is unequal in its parts. We should not further exaggerate the inequality by unwise acts. Government is established for the purpose of making the best of all conditions that are within its control.

The old rule that people favored was "the less government the better." That worked well when there was plenty of room for all. But now we crowd each other so that most of us are crowded out from having those advantages to which we feel entitled, and therefore we want government to give us each an opportunity as nearly equal as is practical. It seems that we must have more government, for no one now claims that the opportunities are as equal as they could be. Those who now have all the advantages are fighting to prevent that. A few are succeeding so well that they do not want many changes. But their number is small when compared with the body of the population. To retain their advantage they found it necessary to take part in politics. Thus far they have prevented the rest of us from establishing a system by which we might retain the products of our own energy instead of permitting the few to appropriate them.

Those who now control tell us that we should be satisfied because we have more advantages now than we used to have and more than our fathers had. In other words, they desire to dictate what we should have and to tell us that we should be satisfied because they do not get more out of us.

Each year new discoveries, inventions, methods, and appliances are found to increase our productive power. Intelligence has taken a long step ahead in the last 50 years. By making use of these new advantages we now produce many times as much as our fathers did with an equal expenditure of energy. In different ways a person, by applying his energy to the use of modern machine power, now produces several hundred times better results than could be produced a generation ago by any method then known.

Modern machinery has enormously increased the amount of work that a farmer can do in a day. But the farmer works nearly as many hours per day as he did 30 years ago. Some new inventions also help the wife to do the housework, but she, too, toils nearly as many hours per day as her mother did. So we might go on through the various industries—including all the wageworkers, yes, even including the professions—and enumerate thousands of ways in which the effectiveness of labor has been immensely increased, in some cases several hundred fold, but still we would find the hours of labor per day not greatly shortened or the advantages anywhere near proportionately increased.

My attention is often directed to how little some persons realize the great forces that have been added and brought within the control of humanity, and how thoughtlessly they suggest that people should be satisfied with their lot because they have a few luxuries now that previous generations did not enjoy. As illustrative of this careless way of neglecting the opportunities to further the interests of the plain people, I read from a creditable newspaper published in my district, as follows:

[From the St. Cloud Journal-Press.]

The Journal-Press man took half a day off and attended a circus. Lined up in front of the big tent were over 300 automobiles, many of them coming from Brainerd, Little Falls, Royalton, Becker, Big Lake, Clearwater, Monticello, Sauk Center, Melrose, Albany, St. Joe, Cold Spring, Paynesville, Eden Valley, Kimball, Watkins, Richmond, and a dozen other nearby towns. The money represented in these purely pleasure machines was probably $50,000.

Inside the tent were over 10,000 people, all well dressed, and half of them put up each 50 cents extra to get a reserved seat. The people came from five or six counties, and all professions were represented. Probably a third of the audience lived on farms, and many of the farmers came in with either top carriages drawn by fine horses or else in their own automobiles.

But seriously and honestly, is there so very great grounds for complaint and discontent? Labor is, in this country at least, fully employed and at good wages. Ten or twenty thousand more men could find ready employment at this time in Minnesota alone. Business of all kinds is prospering and the farmers are on easy street, with good crops, high prices, money in the bank, and automobiles in the barn.

Personally we are going to vote against the candidate who puts up the biggest calamity howl.

What is the sense in anybody trying to make us miserable when 10,000 people can take an afternoon off and enjoy the circus, right in the busiest season?

The quotation is worth a little closer analysis. The editor is not only a good man but an intelligent one. He believes in the welfare of the people, but when he wrote the article he had just been to a circus and had been enjoying himself. He saw 10,000 others who were doing likewise, and he looked upon the happenings of a single afternoon as showing a condition, whereas it was an exception.

The five or six counties referred to comprise a district with 150,000 people, 10,000 of whom attended a circus which annually visits that district. It is not strange that in this district, which is one of the most prosperous and happy in the United States, there should be a $50,000 display in autos at a circus. Everyone should be pleased over that fact as well as that all present should be there and happy. All were entitled to the pleasure they could get, and the reporter properly approved of it. But that, notwithstanding the fact that farmers and others take half a day off once each year to go to the circus, is no reason why the well-meaning editor should have built up "a house of straw" to burn down. His suggestion about the "biggest calamity howl" and about "anybody trying to make us miserable" was merely the "house of straw" which he constructed so that he might watch the blaze while he set it on fire.

Many well-meaning people who are in circumstances that make it unnecessary for them to plan how they are to obtain their necessaries, conveniences, and so forth, look to a circus attendance, a big crop, or other exceptional circumstance as an index to general conditions. It does not occur to them to go into the homes of a sufficient number of families in order to obtain a general average of conditions of life, especially of those less fortunate than they. Comparatively few of those present at the circus were fortunate enough to own carriages and automobiles.

It is not sufficient, in answer to this condition, to say that some of the more fortunate farmers and wage earners have carriages and automobiles; that their wives have servants to help them and that their families are prosperous. The problem of vital interest to us is the welfare of the great majority—the farmers, wage earners, and servants. Since all the modern inventions and appliances referred to produce such great results, why should not all industrious people have all the conveniences to which their industry entitles them? It is not sufficient that some of the farmers and wage earners secure a few of the advantages to which they and all others are entitled. Why should the so-called servants have less than those whom they serve, when their capacities are equal? If our civilization is worth the name, it should be for the promotion of equality among people so far as that can be.

Machine power ought to reduce the costs of the necessaries of life and at the same time decrease the hours of labor per day. The reason why it has not is that it has been appropriated by a few who direct its use to a different purpose. The few will generally be found to be trusts. They operate to produce capital exclusively for themselves. They appropriate all the new inventions and employ just enough of us to operate them. If a machine is invented that will do the work that it formerly required a hundred men to do, the trusts get the machine and instead of reducing the hours of labor per day and decreasing the price of the product, they discharge those of us not needed and pay the remainder about the same wages as were paid before. In that way the trusts, not the people, appropriate the principal advantages of the new inventions. The public has been able to get a little advantage from new inventions in some ways, but has lost out in others.

Whatever our condition, whether we are well to do, in moderate circumstances, or poor, we should know our rights and it is proper to discuss them. The simple truth is that all of us are entitled to the advantages that our properly directed energies make natural. The question is, do we get them, and not whether 7 per cent of us can attend a circus once a year, and if we do, whether we go by automobile or on foot. It is our rights that we want and we can not judge by the attendance at a circus whether we are getting them or not. The majority of us do not have the advantages which, under any well-regulated system, the inventions and appliances of this period would entitle us. We are arguing for a well-regulated system, the same as a farmer plans the methods of planting, cultivating, harvesting, marketing, and so forth. It is not a "calamity howl." It is common sense intelligence to which every American citizen should hasten lest America become the laggard among nations. I read a statement made by William Allen White, as follows:

"Society," he says, "has devoted a century to inventions having for their end and aim the accumulation of wealth; society now is turning from the problems of accumulation to problems relating to the equitable distribution of wealth. It is proper that America, having lagged behind the progress of the world in the intelligent legal treatment of property rights, should now set forth to get in step with modern progress by solving modern problems: The conservation of our natural resources; the care of the honest poor; the protection of workingmen against sickness and accident; the proper housing of the masses; the prevention of contagious diseases; the regulation of public-service corporations; and a score of other problems that arise in considering the duty of him who has to him who has not.

"That there is a well-defined feeling in our hearts manifest in our private charities and our public utterances in conventions and legislature that society is not doing its duty toward those who do the world's work, no one who heeds public sentiment can doubt. This sentiment is growing. It is behind the so-called progressive movement in our politics—giving it moral impetus. When that sentiment hardens and becomes the set and fixed expression of the American people, government will respond to it. For neither courts nor constitutions can stand before public sentiment."

Mr. Whites states the facts beautifully. I agree with his statement. The people should enter the fight to secure, retain, and uphold their rights. Do the people get what they earn or is the most of it absorbed by the trusts?

We have very little to say about prices. The farmer, for instance, does not fix the price of his own products. He takes them to market and asks what he is bid. Usually he gets but one bid, because the combination is against him. If he wishes to ship his products; buys machinery or something that has to be shipped to him; or makes a trip by rail; practically in all cases where he is the purchaser this is an invariable rule, he is forced to pay the prices that are fixed by the parties from whom he buys.

The wage earner is in practically the same position as the farmer. It is not often that he can fix his wage. He is told what he will be paid. Thus the two great forces in economic production, the forces on which all humanity depends—the farmer and the wage earner—must accept for their products and services a price fixed by the few who control big business, and the prices that they must pay for their necessaries are also fixed by the same few.

I have a concrete example in mind. Farmers at Park Rapids, Minn., sold potatoes in the fall of 1911 for 40 cents per bushel. They had to sack them and pay 3 cents for sacks which were not returned, after which they loaded them in the car at Park Rapids. The potatoes were shipped to Kansas and sold in the sacks for $1 per bushel. The farmer received 37 cents and the consumer paid $1. Consumers purchasing in less than sack quantities paid still more. The railroads got 30 cents a bushel without loading or unloading. The farmer furnished the seed, cultivated the ground, harvested the crop, hauled it to market, paid the taxes on his farm and possibly interest on a mortgage. It sums up, for the farmer 37 cents, for the railroad 30 cents for hauling from Park Rapids to the Kansas consumer, for the middleman 33 cents. The producer—that is, the farmer—had to take what he was bid, the consumer had to pay what he was asked, the railroad fixed its own price, as did the others between the producer and the consumer.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINDBERGH. Certainly.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would like to ask if that does not apply generally to farm products?

Mr. LINDBERGH. It does.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The farmer has not gotten this large increase in prices that enters into the cost of living which the consumer has been paying.

Mr. LINDBERGH. He has been obtaining only a small proportion of the increased prices.

Mr. BUCHANAN. And are not these prices largely due very often to watered stock and bonds in private corporations that have been loaded on the different industries of the country?

Mr. LINDBERGH. Very largely so.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Much more so than what people are paying on bonds created for public improvements.

Mr. LINDBERGH. That is correct.

I have studied this subject for several years and to show some of my conclusions have made some speeches that I shall quote from. I first read from a speech I made on June 13, 1911, which contains a quotation from an earlier speech on the same subject:

Go into any large city and it will be found that what our fathers and we have built does not satisfy present desires, so we are expending our energy in tearing down our past work and rebuilding new for future use. Some of us may get some benefit from these, but there is no way we can avoid paying for their entire production. Whatever energy this generation spends it pays for. That is an economic fact, and we would do well to consider some economic facts here instead of playing politics.

On June 16, 1910, I made a statement (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 8270, 61st Cong., 2d sess.) in which I discussed at some length the cause of high prices. I think that any person who will take that statement, read it, and then follow the investigations on his own account will believe that the immense production of property now for future use has had far more to do with increasing prices than the tariff has had. Consider just a few of the many:

The railway systems have been enormously extended. In 1850 there were 8,571 miles of railway in the United States; in 1909 there were 236,838 miles. The passenger traffic has increased approximately 300 per cent in 20 years and the freight over 300 per cent. Many millions of dollars were expended in building railways in that time, a large part of it suited to last as long as the earth stands. Tunnels alone within New York City, built within the last few years and which will last as long as the earth keeps its shape, have cost about $500,000,000, and an order has been made for $257,400,000 more. Old buildings torn down and new ones to take their place, which will last hundreds of years, have lately been and others are being built in this country, costing in the billions of dollars; the increased cost of armies and navies is another great item; canals, the Panama alone to cost $500,000,000, have been and are in process of construction; bridges alone in one city cost about $100,000,000; two railway terminals in the same city, one just completed and the other in process of construction, approximately cost $200,000,000; and so on, I could add to the recent, present, and prospective constructions that have been and are taking place, all of which is to aid in one way and encumber in another the unborn generations at the expense of the present.

Take one item as an illustration and consider it from its different angles:

The Pennsylvania Terminal in New York City cost approximately $100,000,000, and was opened November 26, 1910. The New York Times, at the time, in an editorial commenting on it, said:

"In a sense it is proper to speak of the Pennsylvania's Terminal as a gift to the city. It would be very difficult to show that the road would receive a direct return for its expenditure; that is, that the fares paid for new passengers attracted to its lines by this terminal will suffice to pay interest on its cost."

The editorial did not consider that when the Pennsylvania Railway System undertakes to bolster its freight charges, it figures in the $100,000,000 terminal as a part of the cost of its system on which the Supreme Court holds that it has a right to base its charges and that in fixing them it has a right to a reasonable rate, and that no legislative body can confiscate its property by reducing the rates below a reasonable earning on its capital investment.

The Times editorial further commenting says:

"The Pennsylvania Railroad is a great corporation, and is not exempted from the widespread feeling of hostility to corporations which has been engendered in this country by the talk and writings of countless demagogues and agitators. The Pennsylvania Terminal, admirably serving the needs and promoting the convenience of the public, a magnificent structure which is an adornment to the city, is this corporation's reply to the flow of reckless and irresponsible abuse of corporations."

Here, again, the editor failed to comprehend the fitness of things. The Times errs in its consideration of the Pennsylvania Terminal, for without this new magnificent $100,000,000 terminal the company was, with its old terminals and system of ferries, consistently serving the public, and, as further stated by the Times:

"The road was not compelled to build this station either by law, by any public-service commission's mandate, or by popular clamor."

But as the Times stated, it is a purely voluntary addition to its facilities, the idea of which was born in the mind of A. J. Cassatt.

The directorate of the company erected in a conspicuous place in the station a bronze statue of Mr. Cassatt, with the following inscription carved on the stone setting:

"ALEXANDER JOHNSTON CASSATT, PRESIDENT PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD CO., WHOSE FORETHOUGHT, COURAGE, AND ABILITY ACHIEVED THE EXTENSION OF THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD INTO NEW YORK CITY."

To the millions of people who will annually inspect it this inscription may be a suggestion that they are being daily charged on the food they eat, the clothes they wear, and the luxuries, if any, they enjoy their quota for the construction, maintenance, and interest on the capital invested for this "purely voluntary addition" to the world's greatest terminals.

The truth is that the terminal is an involuntary gift to that city by the people generally, and is not a voluntary gift by the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., as suggested by the Times, but was voluntarily built by the company, and its cost is added to the freight and other charges on the food the poor people of New York and elsewhere eat and the clothes they wear. Not only that, but every farmer and laborer in the United States, and all people, in fact, are, by the law of general average, being taxed for that terminal. It subtracts from the advantages of the people and is one more of the colossal monuments of vested property on which to tax us and our children and all future generations, so long as we measure progress by an erroneous standard.

And the Times, to further display the sophistry of its editorial writer on that occasion, wound up the editorial:

"The new station is not only an example to other public-service corporations, but should serve to warn the public against too ready acceptance of the doctrines and calumnies of self-appointed teachers and guides who make the vilifying of great business concerns their profession."

Surely the "example to other public-service corporations" served to cause another great railroad in the same city—the New York Central—to begin a like terminal, which is now well underway, which, when completed, will cost a sum approximately equaling that paid for the Pennsylvania. These and other stations in other cities, costing extravagant sums, all have their share in making the cost of living higher, for all these railways charge higher freight rates in order to get "legitimate" returns on the capital invested. Consult the court decisions about that. The courts have answered by decree—a grim reality that was far removed from the editorial inspiration of the Times.

Who presents these grand gifts to New York and other cities? It is absurd to say the railroads do. We can excuse the Times editor, for he was dazzled by the magnificence of the terminal station opening in his own city; but those he chooses to call "self-appointed guides and teachers" should not be invited to slink away just because the editor sees only one side—and that the selfish—of a proposition that involves every human being who, while this system lasts, has now or in the future to earn his daily bread.

These "purely voluntary additions," as the Times calls them, are built in many cities without regulation, excepting that suggested in the inscription referred to as Cassatt's "forethought, courage, and ability"; and the "vested interest" in them appeals to all future people with a court's decree—"we, the vested interests, have a right to charge you, the people, interest on our capital and add it to the freight rate on your food and your wares, and make you and your posterity pay for it." To have escaped this decree you should have been born before civilization commenced.

The building of the terminals should be regulated so that the railways could not build two where but one is needed, and the cost also should be confined to a reasonable sum.

The inducement for building exclusively for the use of the future is that capitalists find in it a means of converting the collective energy of the people into producing a fixed capital, and then charge the people interests on their capital that they have created by their own energy.

It does not require a profound student to see that the collective energy of the people applied to the use of modern machinery controlled by the Morgans, Rockefellers, Cassatts, and others will rapidly produce a capital so enormous that the "vested rights" as now interpreted by the courts will, if we let things go by this plan, make us and our posterity the abject serfs of the capitalists. We shall have to regulate the constructions if we would avoid the absolute, certain dependence that will rapidly overtake us in following the rule of the court.

In the Minnesota rate case, lately decided, the court held that the railroad companies were entitled to 7 per cent as a reasonable return upon their capital, practically holding at the same time that the increased value of property, caused by the necessities of an increased population, might be taken into consideration, and that the railways are entitled to interest on that, too.

The value of the property in the United States is approximately $125,000,000. Following the construction of the court, the owners are entitled to tax the people for its use 7 per cent after their expenses are paid, which would on compounding double in about 10 years, be four times that in 20 years, and eight times in 30 years. At that rate the average interest charge per capita 30 years from now would exceed the present average earnings of the wageworker. None but the capitalists would then be able to educate their children. Already 80 per cent of the capital is owned by about 3,000 individuals and concerns.

Instead of looking at the economic facts and the industrial tendencies of things we have drifted into the habit of turning away from these and listening to politicians tell how they are going to remedy all this high cost of living with a simple revision of the tariff. It is the sheerest nonsense. The longer we are fooled with that pretense the more difficult it will be to solve the real economic problems in a proper way, and the greater the sacrifice will be.

Going into this subject further, let us look at things as they are, simultaneous with considering things as it is reasonable that they should be. By doing so plainly the conditions confronting us will become so self-explanatory that we will see at once that we have a remedy for most of our ailments within our control, one that can be simply and easily applied. We need not waste time in envying or criticizing the wealthy, for all of the advantages that they have we can have with less encumbrance.

Mankind can not much longer continue in the folly of producing for so-called profit as the main incentive, for with that as the first incentive is what creates the very wealthy. The incentive that should govern in production is necessity—the people's actual requirements. In other words, production should be so regulated as to practically produce those things which would supply the urgent, necessary, and desirable common demands. That is economic law, and if followed, development and production would be natural and not abnormal. We would all have what is properly due us if that were done.

Let us consider the city of New York as a concrete example. It is the most conspicuous example in existence of reckless and wanton extravagance; of social practices and business methods and management that contribute to the high cost of living. New York City is the Babylon of the twentieth century, anno Domini, on a modern and exaggerated scale. Business disaster awaits the people there who depend on the system of investment of their capital for their living and means of entertainment. When people apply true economics in their business management the wealthy of that city will necessarily suffer great losses. That time is near, and the enormous system investment development in process there, now greater than ever, will make the catastrophe to these investors correspondingly greater. To understand this we must analyze and study some of the facts.

New York City's development to its present proportions was based on forced and abnormal conditions that have been and are an injury to the Nation. That city's growth looks greatest now, but it is taking its last grand dash and will soon reach the down turn, after which it will continue to decline until it reaches the plane where natural conditions will be able to support it. Such an overgrowth could not be healthy. It is detrimental to the rank and file of its own people even more than to people elsewhere. Many of that city's expensive structures will be vacated. The districts where the people are crowded together, striving to work out what is a miserable existence, will be abandoned. That should encourage people generally. The selfish interests will attack these statements, but the attack will not be along the lines of economic argument. In all probability there will be an attempt to reduce these statements to absurdity by avoiding a discussion of the economic truths involved.

The New York Times, July 7, 1912, devoted a page to the city's subways. It began with the following headlines:

BILLION-DOLLAR SUBWAY WORLD'S GREATEST UNDERTAKING.

It had the pictures of J. P. Morgan and Jacob Schiff as the bankers backing the scheme. It also showed three of the managers of the subway systems. In large type, formed into an inverted pyramid, appeared the following:

Greatest amount ever spent in a similar area since the world began; it makes the building of the pyramids a small task, and the new additions to the system alone cost more than the Panama Canal.

I direct special attention to the fact that the subways are not New York's prime development, but, rather, an incident of its growth. They are merely one of the evidences of its extravagances. Every year substantial and valuable buildings, enough in number to make a respectable city in themselves, are destroyed in order to give place to more costly and elegant ones—some of them the world's tallest and most expensive. The cost of the Singer Building was mounted into additional millions to make it the tallest building in the world. The directors of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. played with the funds of its policy holders to build another that would eclipse the Singer Building, at least in height. Including the grounds, it cost approximately $22,500,000. The Metropolitan Life Building could not long retain the distinction of being the tallest, for the Woolworth Building, in process of construction, is still higher.

Building after building has been constructed in the million-dollar class in that great city, until their aggregate cost may be reckoned in the billions. That is the scale by which things are done in New York City. It is a city of extremes. Even so-called society must there outdo in extravagant expenditure all other places. Even Paris, the example the rest of the world apes in some of its dress and fashion parade, can not equal it.

It is a great picture to see New York by day or night. Its playhouses, its hotels, its clubs, its magnificence in a hundred or more ways amazes the average spectator. He thinks he sees the wonders of New York when he makes such a visit. But all that is visible to the eye is but the pin-money expenditure from the main field of speculative operation, of which neither the humble inhabitant nor the visitor ever gets a view.

If the visitor could see the books of account and know and understand the operations of those who run big business—financial, industrial, and speculative—he would be amazed to see the methods by which the few have not only levied on the industry of all the people in order to maintain the extravagances to which I have referred, but who have also in the same manner amassed the vast individual fortunes through which they now grasp the control of the country's finances, its principal industries, the transportation and distribution agencies, and the main material resources. In the handling and operating of these the toiling millions are employed. In what these toilers produce and in the productions of the farm lie the principal wealth of the country. Upon it capitalists draw for the building of the greater cities, more railways, more canals, more of everything that gives place to permanent investment.

Whatever view we may take as to the advisability of the great and constantly increasing construction that is in process for the sake of investment—whether we favor it or not—we know that it saps the energy of the people and takes too many of us out from the occupation of producing the actual necessaries for physical existence, such as food, clothing, shelter, and so forth. Further, it prevents us from securing the necessary time for personal, moral, and intellectual improvement.

The number of people now occupied in constructing for purely speculative and investment purposes and for the purpose of satisfying vanity, in proportion to those so occupied in any previous generation, is so much greater that no one should look much further for the principal reason why we pay more for the necessaries of life than we formerly did. To illustrate the point stated, I shall again consider the city of New York.

In this great city we are furnished with examples of the principal causes for the high cost of living. These suggestions should also teach us how the cost may be greatly reduced and at the same time how farm products and the wages of labor may be increased in their purchasing power, with employment for all and the hours of labor per day reduced, thus giving all people more time for study and improvement and the enjoyment of their rights. This again would build up the villages and small cities, making thousands of small distributing centers instead of a few that are overgrown. Two new terminals in New York City, the Pennsylvania and the New York Central, cost approximately $200,000,000. They consist of huge piles of iron, stone, glass, and so forth, orderly shaped, chiseled, and arranged into two beautiful massive depots, the approaches through tunnels and over numerous tracks. Those terminals are exclusively the product of labor. True, their material substances are of the creations of Nature, but the work of forming them into shape for use is entirely labor's. We may ask of what effect is the manner of their construction in the consumption of our time and the power of machinery and whether they were really necessary. At $1,000 per annum there would have been directly employed 40,000 people for a period of five years—some in the quarries getting the rock out from Mother Earth, some getting out the ore, some upon the railroads and the ships, some in the smelters and factories, and others immediately upon the grounds and buildings.

At the same rate the families dependent upon them would add 160,000 more people. While the number of people and the time employed is stated only approximately, it nevertheless serves to show the conditions. Whether there were more or some less employed is not material. The number directly employed does not take into consideration those more remotely occupied in supplying their necessities, namely, the farmer who produces the wheat, the miller who grinds the flour, the baker who bakes the bread, and the merchant who sells and delivers it to these men as food to keep them and their families alive while they construct these terminals. Then, again, we have the farmer who raises the sheep and furnishes the wool; the spinner, the weaver, the tailor, and so forth; in fact, all who produce the things to wear; and still again the builders who construct the houses for these families, and those employed in the transportation of all these things. Further, all of us thus remotely employed must in turn be supported with many of our necessaries from still more remote operators. The response that I frequently receive to these statements is that we must have work, eat, wear clothes, be sheltered, have entertainments and that there is no loss, even when we produce extravagant structures, because it gives employment. That is where shortsightedness so frequently is shown.

Let us see what it means to employ 40,000 people to produce in our generation expensive buildings, tunnels, grades, and all of the other things to which I have referred that will last as long as people exist. Practically 200,000 people were supported for five years by the rest of us while they were building these two New York terminals, mere incidents in that city's growth. Those people produced neither food, clothes, nor shelter for themselves. Others of us did that for them, and therefore we all work more hours each day to supply them what they eat and wear. They competed with the rest of us in consuming the food, clothes, and other necessaries of life, and produced nothing except terminals. These terminals are like a drop in the ocean as compared with the great number of other structures that are permanent in construction and will last for many centuries, and some of them forever, all of which we pay for with our energy at the time of construction.

The truth that it illustrates and teaches us is that in our own generation we make improvements that will be for the use of future generations. Those of us who are thus occupied must be furnished with all of the necessaries of life. Of these we produce no part. No one should claim that the production of these structures is desirable simply because they create a condition that gives us employment. We have passed the period when such a claim should receive our respect. We should seriously consider ways in which we can use our modern machinery, better appliances in the production of the actual necessaries, conveniences, and luxuries, so as to insure our having them, with less cost of energy than is now required of most people to even secure their barest necessaries.

It might be claimed that the New York terminals were a necessity. As a matter of fact, that city and the traveling public entering it had better facilities before the new terminals were constructed than we have in most of our cities. I have been in New York many times before and since, and while I acknowledge that the new terminals are more convenient than the old, there is no such material difference as to justify the charge and incumbrance placed upon humanity for the new terminals.

Some who believe in living in luxury and extravagance and who do not take into consideration the welfare of the people as a whole would advocate, possibly, that it was necessary to have the additional advantages afforded by the $200,000,000 terminals. If we allow such an argument to prevail, there is no limit placed upon those who control the centralized wealth making expenditures wherever they choose, and relying upon the decree of the courts holding that they are entitled to recover a reasonable rate of interest upon the capital invested. The people should not be compelled by any decree of the court or by any Government agency to pay interest and dividends upon investments which are not first determined to be necessary for the general welfare.

The first point to be noted in connection with this extraordinary investment development of the present generation, of which New York City furnishes the most conspicuous example, is the fact that modern machinery, appliances, and human energy is so largely monopolized in the production of buildings, railway systems, canals, harbor and other improvements that give so little present service as compared with their use by future generations. How can we expect to reduce the cost of living and the hours of the laboring day and at the same time increase the production of the necessaries of life if we use up most of the machine power and human energy in producing things which are principally for investment and to serve other generations?

The second point that I wish to impress is the fact that in addition to consuming our energy in the production of things for remote generations there is also the fact that production thus obtained is, under present practice, centralized into the control of a few individuals. That production is called vested capital, on which the general public is taxed rent, dividends, and interest. Thus we see it is not only the burden of production that is heaped upon the toilers of the world, but afterwards there is the burden of maintenance in addition to the interest charge. It must be plain to any thoughtful person that the methods of business as now employed and the manner in which we are producing is one of the principal causes for the high cost of living, and if we would remedy the difficulty we shall have to regulate production. If people were employed in the proper proportion throughout the different industries and occupations that produce or supply the necessaries and conveniences that we require, we should then have those necessaries in greater abundance and with less expenditure of time.

Suppose, for instance, that 3,000,000 of New York City's population and 5,000,000 from Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, and other overgrown cities were to be distributed into the smaller towns and cities and onto farms, thus bringing the producers and consumers into closer proximity. There would be no $1,000,000,000 subway for the New York Times to brag about; neither would there be $200,000,000 expended for terminals in that city. There would be no 25 to 50 story buildings. Everything would be on a less expensive scale. Then the remaining people in those cities, as well as those who were distributed into the less-populated sections of the country, and also the people living in the districts to which they came, all would be more prosperous. An immense amount of machine power would be saved to be put to more useful purposes than building up extravagant cities. It would mean that the farmer, the wage earner, everyone, would secure better results from his energy and would not be compelled to labor so many hours per day for the necessaries of life.

The subject is so great that to discuss it at length with concrete examples from the works of the times would extend indefinitely, and therefore I shall not attempt to do much more than add to my remarks by quoting from my former speeches on this subject. So many people have been impressed by politicians that the tariff is the great problem before the people that affects the cost of living that political parties as well as candidates have been turned in and out again and again. Nothing so suits the special interests as to have the people occupy their time thinking that the tariff is to blame for our troubles. The tariff system is in bad shape, but it is of minor importance as compared with the financial, the transportation, and the economic systems of the country. Those who claim that the tariff is the principal cause for the high cost of living should be called on to show what the difference in the cost of what one buys in this country would be if the same things were purchased in any other country. That difference would be so little that the fellow who claims the tariff is all to blame for the high prices would be at a loss to make good his claim.

In the management of our social and economic relations natural laws are not sufficiently followed, and the high cost of living is chargeable to that largely. It can be reduced only by an adjustment to natural conditions. Except for temporary causes that may for a time cheapen the cost, living will in reality grow higher and higher until we establish economic order. I read from one of my former speeches the following:

The idea of future use does not exclude all present use, for in the construction of canals, bridges, tunnels, grading, and buildings of a permanent nature they serve present needs, but the construction bears its cost for remote future service as well. The National Museum here in Washington is an example. We use that building now, but the amount of energy lately expended in its construction is principally for the use of future generations.

The most notable example in the world of a single project to convey the idea of present production for future purposes is the Panama Canal.

January, 1910, there were employed on the Canal Zone 45,000 people, who, on the basis of family heads, would represent a population now supported by that project of at least two and one-half times those so employed. To furnish these with food, clothes, and shelter, and supply the machinery and appliances with which the work is done and the material that goes into the construction, all of which are produced elsewhere, requires a still larger number of people, and these, again, require food, clothing, and shelter, machinery, tools, and appliances with which to do their work; and what they use, too, must be produced mostly by still others; so that, all in all, the Panama Canal, constructed wholly for future use, requires an expenditure of known energy involving several hundred thousand people, including their families.

In the city of Washington alone there are now 104 persons, exclusive of their families, engaged wholly in clerical work connected with that enterprise. The canal will serve no purpose until it is completed and, compared with the more remote future, little during the present generation. The Panama Canal when completed will be one of the world's great means of conservation, but for the present generation it serves to consume only. We tax ourselves for that construction for the use of future generations. I do not mention this as a discouragement to its construction. But when a farmer builds a new house he has to pay for it, and so the people are now paying for the canal, and it adds to the cost of living.

There is each year a proportionately increasing expenditure of energy in making permanent improvements on our rivers and harbors, on forts, in grading, tunneling through hills and mountains and under rivers, and bridging rivers. For example, the new tunnel-railway systems in New York City approach in cost half a billion dollars.

In the publication known as "King's Views of New York," the taxable property of that city is given as $7,158,190,400, and property exempt from taxation is given as $1,239,883,798. It is well known that the taxable value is seldom over one-half of the sale value. In the taxable valuation the greater part of personal property escapes. This increased production has not ceased, for in New York City alone, says the same publication:

"Engineering works to cost $600,000,000 are now underway, and others to the extent of an additional $1,000,000,000 have been planned. The bringing to the city of 200,000,000 gallons of water a day from the Catskill Mountains involves building 12 reserve reservoirs and a conduit 60 miles long, at a cost of $161,000,000."

I read in their daily papers of April 5, 1910, that "civic bodies have asked for $800,000,000 for subways," and the press further states 1,000 citizens visited the city hall clamoring for the above.

The people call for investments that would ruin them if they were to increase in the next 15 years in the proportion that they have in the last 15.

The above are quotations from my remarks made in the House June 16, 1910. The succeeding years have followed along with even greater plans that are being carried out. Quoting further from my former speech:

Nothing would more clearly demonstrate the effect of this increasing production for investment and future use on the cost of living than to print in the RECORD the views of 50 or more of the recent important structures in that city merely as an index to the thousands of others that have recently been and are now being constructed, as well as those in contemplation there and elsewhere in this country.

More people are now employed in building for future use than ever. There is agitation now in this Capital City for many new permanent Government buildings that would cost perhaps more than $25,000,000; $13,500,000 is included in the pending appropriation bill. It is said that the Government rent account is so high that it would be cheaper to issue bonds and pay interest and have the Government own its buildings. Admitting that that may be a fact, the interest and rent accounts do not enter into primary causes, but are social conditions.

The work on that class of improvements has required the continuous energy of largely increasing numbers of people. The product of that energy will serve future generations much more than it does the present. The work is of permanent nature, produced by present energy, and those thus employed, the same as those engaged in the construction of the Panama Canal, require food, clothing, shelter, tools, and machinery with which to work, and all these must be produced by still others, and those so producing likewise require to be supplied by others again, and so on indefinitely. The number of people thus engaged in proportion to the present population is so far in excess of what it was in earlier periods that it is a very material factor in connection with increased costs.

The people of the present seem also to have gone insane on the construction of monuments, statuary, and the like. These are placed in our parks and public places. In cemeteries are vaults, tombstones, and other monumental work requiring an amount of energy in construction far in excess of that employed in any earlier period. And yet it serves no economic end, and those who furnish this energy must be fed, clothed, and sheltered as others are.

I could furnish examples, almost indefinitely, of the great increase in energy employed now over earlier periods in the production of things for permanent use. It indicates clearly that we are living for a different purpose than we were 25 or 30 years ago. The increase has been enormous in the last 10 years.

Duplication of labor makes an enormous addition to the cost of living. The railways early formed a system, the effect of which was to rob the people of a part of nature's resources and advantages, and to reduce their average earning capacity, thereby inflicting on them a general injury. The purpose of the railways in doing this was to force the payment to them of greater freight charges. They divided the country into distributing centers and called these terminals, giving to them preferential rates. I quote part of my speech on the new interstate-commerce bill to illustrate the point:

"Seattle, Wash., is a railway terminal point and Spokane, in the same State, is not. The two cities are 400 miles apart on the line of the Northern Pacific Railway. When freight is shipped from such points as St. Paul, Chicago, and other eastern cities to supply the Spokane market, it is subject to the railway's arbitrary terminal system. Solely on account of that system it is cheaper in many cases for the people in Spokane to have their freight shipped to Seattle and then back to Spokane than it is to consign it directly to Spokane.

"For example, the freight on a certain class of goods from New York or Boston to Spokane is $1.25 per hundredweight; to Seattle it is 95 cents. The freight back to Spokane is 26 cents per hundredweight. Thus it appears that on that class the freight from Atlantic coast terminals to Seattle and back again to Spokane is 2 cents less per hundredweight than it is to ship it directly to Spokane, and there are many other classes of which the same is true. The freight on class 1 from New York to Spokane is $4.15 and to Seattle $3.

"The freight from Seattle back to Spokane is $1.35. On class 1 the railroads obtain 20 cents per hundredweight more for hauling to Seattle and back than they do for the direct haul to Spokane, and yet I have been reliably informed that on account of the physical conditions existing in the territory between Spokane and Seattle the cost of transportation to the railways between those points, 400 miles, the trip one way only is fully 50 per cent of the cost from New York to Spokane, a distance of nearly 3,000 miles. The charge on agricultural implements from New York to Spokane is $1.75 and to Seattle is $1.25. I mention these merely as examples. By the railway's system of calling Seattle a terminal the absurdity of the duplication of labor and capital is made less apparent. That absurdity gives to Seattle an added wholesale trade that is naturally tributary to Spokane. The effect is that freight destined ultimately for Spokane from points east goes through the wholesalers at Seattle. Calling Seattle a terminal creates that absurdity, but nevertheless it is the railway's excuse for discrimination against Spokane. Sometimes the railways excuse themselves on the ground that they are competing with waterways, but they also practice like discriminations in favor of some cities in which there is no natural water competition.

"Briefly stated, Spokane practically pays the total freight charge to Seattle, a long haul by 400 miles, plus the return to Spokane, an additional 400 miles, the return being charged for on the short-haul basis. Before the freight gets to Seattle from the East it passes through Spokane, where it belongs, and naturally should be switched for delivery to the ultimate consignees, thereby saving the trip to Seattle and return, 800 miles extra, but the railways, by the terminal subterfuge, send freight on to Seattle, from which point it must be returned. By doing that the ultimate consignees, in addition to paying extra freight charges, also pay warehouse expenses and handling through middlemen at Seattle. Now, then, picture the real facts. Almost innumerable engines have been, are, and will be attached to as many trains of 30 or more cars each, loaded with freight ultimately destined for Spokane, on their way from the East. Engineers, firemen, brakemen, and conductors are required with each of these trains. Think of these trains all loaded with goods for use in Spokane, the very city from which they take a new start. There they are now, and have been in the past by the thousands, and will continue to be until the folly is stopped by sane legislation, which it is our duty now to enact. These trains are actually run on to Seattle. After reaching there, their freight has to come back over the same track. They make that trip of 800 miles to satisfy greed.

"The railways by that process are depleting the coal supply and unnecessarily and ridiculously using up the energy of men, all as a pretext to charge extra freight to the people tributary to Spokane. I do not mention Seattle and Spokane as exceptions. The system prevails generally in railway practice. Practically every town in the district I represent is unfairly discriminated against to the advantage of a few interests in larger cities elsewhere. The railways everywhere discriminate in favor of their selected terminal points and against all other localities, thereby compelling millions of people to locate at these various terminals who otherwise would have selected localities in which to settle determined by natural physical advantages.

"We can not dismiss the subject here, however, for the waste does not stop with the wanton consumption of labor, the burning of coal, the wear and tear of tracks, etc.; but on account of the discrimination great numbers of people other than those mentioned are compelled to perform additional labor made necessary solely by the subterfuge of separating by long distances producers from consumers by discriminatory rates designed for the purpose of securing the long haul. The long haul where a short haul would do better requires additional sidetracks, additional labor to keep them in repair, additional warehouses, and other expenses of maintenance, and in the terminal cities are required additional systems of street railways, additional middlemen, etc. It keeps growing as it is figured out to its more ultimate effect.

"The railways thus selfishly secure several times the amount of business that they would if they gave the general public the benefit of natural economic conditions, for by the latter production and consumption would be in nearer proximity.

"Without railway discrimination in their favor, cities with as large population as New York, Chicago, Philadephia, and others of that class would be impossible with a general population of only 90,000,000. All our smaller cities would then be larger and the people everywhere more thrifty. It is impossible, even approximately, to determine what great injury this discrimination has caused the general public.

"The consequence of that evil practice of discrimination is that the wholesale business centers arbitrarily in certain cities, say, like in Seattle, which supply the territory that is naturally tributary to Spokane."

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. LINDBERGH. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does not that seem to indicate that God himself did not know which one of these cities should become the place nearest to New York?

Mr. LINDBERGH. That may be; but I should say that God, even in His infinite power and wisdom, could not have anticipated, when He created man, that man, when clothed with the authority of a railway director, would by the subterfuge of long and short hauls so distort the advantages of physical conditions of the earth that it would be necessary to charge less for a long haul than for one 800 miles shorter on the same road, and make that kind of practice the general system of the country, thereby depriving the people generally of the advantages of natural selection.

One of the excuses railways offer where the discrimination is in favor of towns located on water navigation is that they must compete with water transportation. And then there are those who would vote to pay out of the Treasury of the United States for ship subsidy, so that American ships may use the people's money to compete with American railways to still further reduce freight charges to the towns on water transportation and charge the loss, if any, to the people who do not live on navigable waters. If some of you ship-subsidy Members desire to help American shipping you might think a little of what the railways say about the long being charged to the short haul to compete with navigation.

Mr. WEISSE. Would it not be an advantage first to get a real good regulation bill and take care of the American shipper before we start on the ocean to take care of foreign shippers?

Mr. LINDBERGH. There is no doubt about that. We would better adjust ourselves to the natural conditions created by God instead of paying subsidy to help out some of the special interests.

Since answering the above question of Mr. Weise on the floor over two years ago, the question of an indirect subsidy to American ships by giving them free toll on the Panama Canal has come up and been voted on in the House. I believe that there is no more sense in the American people taxing themselves to build that great canal and then giving the American shipowners the free use of it than there would be for the United States to build a transcontinental railway and then turn and give the use of it free to the railways. In neither case would we get advantage for what we pay. To show examples to further emphasize what I mean by that statement I read from a speech I made in the House on February 27, 1912, the following:

We gave away our public domain, our timber, our mineral, our water powers, our ports, and our terminals, etc. That is what the standpatters in Congress gave away. Do the railroads charge us less freight because they get hundreds of millions of acres free land grant? Do we get lumber cheap because the lumbermen got the timber for almost nothing and much of it through political trickery? Do we get the products of the mines cheap because the owners got the ores for little or nothing? Does the owner of a lot, who gets it for a few dollars, sell it cheap when the demand for it has increased the value to thousands? If the rich getting things for nothing makes things cheap, how do you account for the high cost of living? How will you account for the Rockefellers, the Morgans, the Hills, the Harrimans, if when they get things for nothing they give the people the benefit of it—I mean the 3,000 persons who own and control more wealth than all the other 93,000,000 together? Are they letting us have things cheap because what they have cost them so little?

All this talk about the consumer paying the ultimate cost of the toll and that therefore we should make the canal free for the shipowner is ridiculous. If that statement is true, we should exempt the farmers from taxes, because they will be added to the price of wheat, corn, stock, and other products. The farmer is not asked what he charges for his produce. The buyer fixes the price of those and tells the farmer to take it or not, as he likes, but the farmer does not fix the price of what he must buy. That is fixed principally by the trusts.

The farmer must pay it or go without. The wage earner is in practically the same position as the farmer. Both are victims of the big combinations, and they who advocate giving free tolls, which President Taft has said are an indirect ship subsidy, and which every student knows to be true, do so to make a few more rich at the people's expense. Reading again from my former speech:

I noticed that Mr. James J. Hill, one of the greatest men in the country, not only as a railroad man, but generally a well-informed and profound thinker of sound judgment, recently said:

"The tonnage offered the railroads for transportation is constantly on the increase, and there is little doubt that the railroads will be called upon to furnish more transportation units than they have ever before been asked to furnish. From all indications it appears certain that by next fall or early winter the railroads will be totally unable to furnish anything like the amount of transportation facilities which will be demanded by the country."

No man knows better than Mr. Hill that the terminal discrimination system is one of the causes of the conditions to which he refers.

That by next fall or early winter the railroads will be totally unable to furnish anything like the amount of transportation facilities which will be demanded by the country.

Of course Mr. Hill's statement, so far as his interests are concerned, is no complaint, but is a prediction of great fall and winter business. To those who can not get cars or transportation when the times comes, it will be a complaint.

The uneconomic conditions created by discrimination in favor of the long as against the short hauls are the cause of the trouble which Mr. Hill stated as likely to occur; but if Congress will so amend this bill that there will be no discrimination in favor of special interests in the railroad's selected terminals, and then provide that the bill shall take effect 90 days after its passage instead of 6 months as now proposed by the bill, there will not be so many "units" required to take care of that extra 800 miles from Spokane to Seattle and back, and to cover like conditions that exist to greater or less degree in hundreds of other places.

It takes a great stretch of imagination to justify the hauling of freight from New York, Boston, or other Atlantic seaboards, through Spokane to Seattle and back to Spokane for the people of Spokane in order to compete with water navigation.

Some improvements have been brought about by the rulings of the Interstate Commerce Commission since I made the statement, but the discrimination of which I complain is not stopped.

We are paying the penalty of railway discrimination in the shape of increased cost of living.

We should not forget that the effectiveness of machinery, guided by our increased knowledge in the application of our labor, reduces the energy cost of production very many times, and if it had not been for the additional advantages given to production by the use of machinery we would long since have found the present system intolerable. If labor had been employed in the use of all new machinery to the best advantage in economical development of our enormous natural resources, the net cost of production and of living would have been immensely decreased and our advantages correspondingly increased. To illustrate the saving of energy, I call attention to the fact that when my father located at Melrose, less than 50 years ago, the distance from St. Paul was 145 miles by wagon road and is now 108 miles by rail. Freighting was then done principally by ox team. It would have taken 10 wagons, 40 oxen, and 5 men 6 days to haul 40,000 pounds of freight from St. Paul to Melrose.

To-day it would be placed in a small car, and 60 of these attached to one engine, and with 5 men to operate the train they would make the trip in a day. There would be 12 cars to each man. The 5 men so applying their labor to the use of modern methods would haul 60 times as much in 1 day as 5 men under the old way did in 6 days.

One man, by the use of modern methods in the case referred to, now does 360 times as much transportation per day as 1 man did with the old ox-team method. What becomes of the saving of energy? Who gets the advantages of it? The people of Melrose, for instance, do not now get their freight 360 times cheaper than they did under the old ox-team system. A large part of this increased energy has gone into what we now term capital, controlled by a few; part has served to increase our general conveniences and luxuries, enjoyed by us in different degrees.

That is an exceptional case, of course, but that improved machinery has added enormously to the productions of labor stands without challenge. That should decrease the cost of living, but is offset by expenses, interest, dividends, etc., to which I shall directly call attention.

Lately President Taft is reported to have said "This is the automobile age." We shall have to plead guilty to the indictment, if it was intended as such, for we are in the automobile business; not only literally, but figuratively as well, for everything is on the automobile scale, and taking the automobile to illustrate:

The labor department of the State of Michigan for 1909 reports the motor-car output for that year in that State reached the enormous figure of $135,000,000 wholesale. Their pay roll alone showed that 27,996 men were employed directly in the production. In the city of Detroit the figures for labor and cost for the year, as appear in an article on the "Greatest auto town—Detroit," show the progressing increase, as follows:

Year.	Men employed.	Cars produced.	Value.
1907	4,452	.....	.....
1908	8,430	18,260	$23,595,000
1909	14,500	45,560	54,325,000
1910 (estimated)	25,000	123,000	130,000,000

What the total output in that special industry in the entire country is I do not know. No other State equals Michigan, but undoubtedly the total of the others far exceeds the above figures. The life of an automobile is short. It takes an army of chauffeurs to run them. The figures account for one year only, which show that even the Panama Canal in its consumption is small in proportion. We pay it all in the cost of living.

Without giving further examples I wish to inquire from what source we get all this extra energy employed in the duplication of labor and capital and in the production for future use? We realize that the effectiveness of labor has been increased manyfold by the use of machinery. The increased production thus obtained has been absorbed principally in supplying the waste of energy caused by the duplication of labor and capital and in production for future use, but modern machinery and methods were not alone sufficient to meet this increased demand.

To meet this extraordinary demand for human energy there has been a shifting of population from the country to the cities. People have left their farms to take up and do the increased work caused by the condition referred to. Immigration has supplied a part, but farmers have come in greater and in constantly increasing numbers to the cities to do all kinds of work, from the ordinary laborer to the most skilled artisan, and to all the professions and business occupations in general. Most of our great men have come from the farm. Farmers seem to have considered that they were getting better pay and advantages by going to the cities. The cities, on the whole, appear to them to offer greater inducements. That is responsible for the increasing population of the cities over the country, but the tide will turn.

There are some things in connection with this change that the public failed to take notice of. No notice was taken of the fact that labor is not getting pay commensurate with the additional advantages afforded in the fuller and more complete use of machinery. Labor is led to believe that it is paid better now than ever, and as prima facie evidence of this capitalists point to our increased conveniences and luxuries.

The reason the remaining farmers have been able to supply their departing brethren with needed products from the farms was because of their use of improved machinery.

Suppose we had not wasted our energy in keeping up the long duplicating hauls, as illustrated between Spokane and Seattle, and suppose, too, that the population of the country had distributed itself according to natural selection, as it would have done excepting for the fact of the railway's discrimination, then our producers and consumers would be in nearer proximity. Cities of the size of New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, and others now overgrown would have been much smaller and their inhabitants more thrifty and happy, and that which is now their excess would have been distributed over the continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific in obedience to natural laws.

Then all would have been more prosperous. Then modern machinery with the better knowledge of application would be applied to a production more directly connected with our present needs. We would now be getting better results, and we would not be using up our natural resources with such alarming rapidity.

The violation of natural laws to favor a few special interests is most alarming, and, unless we correct our present system, disaster ultimately awaits the Nation.

Conservation of our forests, of our coal, oil, and minerals, and of our water powers is now uppermost in the public mind; but, so far as I have been able to observe, the way to the best means for the conservation has not been considered.

The greatest service we can do ourselves and future generations is to establish transportation rates determined by the reasonableness of conditions. The transportation systems are the arteries of our commercial relations. To make freight rates that shall give to all localities and to all parties rates governed by the reasonableness of conditions, instead of by the absurdity of the railway terminal system and competition, will stop the excessive growth of the large cities, where most of the waste occurs, and will turn the people back to the smaller towns.

Producers and consumers will then be in closer proximity, and there will not be the waste in unnecessary hauling back and forth as now. It will also reduce the production for future use. It will lessen our own burdens and leave future generations to come in on more natural conditions and give them a chance to solve more problems suited to their times.

Observe, again, that the farmers have gone to the cities for what seems like self-interest to them. Suppose self-interest should turn the tide back to the farms and villages. The terminal cities could not retain all their people if it became clear to them that they would be generally improved by a return to farms and smaller towns. If we make transportation rates meet natural conditions, the farms and smaller towns will rapidly improve. Those who found their lot satisfactory in the large cities would stay, and those who saw better opportunities elsewhere would emigrate to the places that looked best to them. That would improve those who remain as well as those who departed, and all would receive the advantages of the net decrease in cost of living. The change would be obeying a law of self-interest.

Labor has been overtaxed by the present methods. The more roundabout method used to employ labor the more labor is taxed to maintain intermediary agencies. All the burdens of production rest on labor in some form. It is the roundabout process, through a multiplicity of intermediary agencies, that has put the price of necessities so high that life is a serious problem to all who maintain themselves by daily toil.

Labor gets its best results from an economical distribution of employment rather than by creating additional work to be done, unless such work supplies actual necessities.

We can maintain several times our present population in prosperity equal to or, in fact, greater than the present if we conserve our natural resources and those created by labor and eliminate the work that absorbs without creating necessities.

When one knows the area of the United States and comprehends its vast natural resources and realizes that at first all of it was wild and most of it unoccupied and unclaimed, except as the public domain, it fills the measure of one's thought as to how, in the short period of our history, the transformation has been made from its wild state to the richest and busiest nation on earth. Orators have made use of the fact to deliver themselves of some great masterpieces. I would take from none his pride or enthusiasm for his country. We all love our American institutions, but we should not rest content with orations nor view with superficial eye the great wealth that has been accumulated out of natural resources and the people's energy without inquiring as to whether these are still intact for the continuing common good. It is not enough that in these we surpass all other countries unless they are enjoyed, in a general way, by those who furnish the energy to make them and are guaranteed to continue for the common welfare.

Very little of the public domain is left. It is now vested in private ownership. It is said that 80 per cent of the wealth in America is owned and controlled by 3,000 estates, corporations, and individuals. Of the remaining 20 per cent a considerable part is owned by other wealthy people and concerns. Time permits only a partial review of why so much property is vested in so few.

Great wealth has come from natural resources, coupled with production of labor. Under present adjustment we require to use wealth, and we pay interest and dividends on it, so the public domain and what labor produced is now vested in a few whom we pay for its use. How much we do not know, but we may approximate it. It is estimated by the Treasury Department that the corporation-income tax, if the law is held valid, will yield about $30,000,000 the first year—1 per cent on $3,000,000,000 of their net earnings in excess of $5,000. I can not state it authoritatively, but I have no doubt that the profits in interest and dividends on capital not subject to this tax exceeds that which is and that the total interest and dividend charge per annum exceeds $7,000,000,000. If we had controlled our public domain for our common welfare and had made rules regulating commerce and trade so that it would have adjusted to natural conditions, then the wealth would have been distributed among the people and we would not now be paying such enormous interest. If things are continued under present practice of compounding interest and dividends for the wealthy, our social system will crush under its own weight.

Distributing $7,000,000,000 on all living, from the cradle to the grave, it is $77 per capita. What happens to a husband and wife with five children under working age and two dependent parents—not an unusual family? Their burden would be $693 per annum and still rising; but "cheer up," for the worst is coming.

In order to enable a few to get this vested wealth, a false system had to be established, permitted by the Government. The expense in energy to support that system dwarfs the $7,000,000,000 interest and dividend accounts in comparison. All expense is charged before interest is computed. If it were seen by us; if we had it in our hands and then paid it, we would realize and be in more haste to correct the evil, but those who cornered the wealth knew that, and by indirection keep most of us blind to the fact.

The rules by which we are governed make it as effectually a charge against us as if we executed and delivered an enforceable mortgage upon our persons. It compels us to work more hours per day. Before our wages are fixed they are reduced by the calculation. What we buy costs us more.

We permitted the Government to be loosely conducted and allowed the forests, minerals, and other primitive wealth to get under exclusive control. Those in control charge all we can stand for the things we must have. For the most of us the limit of our capacity to pay determines the price. In the place of values being governed by relation they are arbitrarily determined by force of circumstances within control of the interests.

These demand us to be content with our prosperity and cite the fact that we enjoy more luxuries, live better than ever. They say no other country has such prosperity. I do not deny that.

My inquiry is: Do we obtain our natural advantages? I say we do not. Every advancement made by civilization is due to add to our common welfare. If not, then the word "advancement" is a misnomer.

Consider what machinery has done in the way of increasing production. Within the period of our country's history new inventions enable one man to produce many times more than a man could at the beginning of our national career.

This increased production is one of the reasons why we have been more prosperous as time has advanced; but if the surplus increase continues to concentrate in the hands of few, and the necessities of the people, by reason of their increased numbers, shall become greater, and those who control the necessaries shall be permitted to increase the price in proportion to the increase in necessity, then we are certain to reach the crashing point.

Another reason why we have been more prosperous than other countries is that our primitive resources were the inducement to people to come from all parts of the world to make this their home and join us in the country's development. We have left to the old countries their aged and decrepit. They have nursed their youth from the cradle to the full strength of manhood and womanhood, and then their young men and women have come developed sufficiently to immediately become a part of our producing energy. We have not expended our Public Treasury for their education; nor was our time expended in making them self-sustaining. It would have made a difference in our progress if 50 years ago immigration had ceased. It would have made still more difference if somewhere else on this globe there had been another continent that offered to our young men and women much better inducements than our own, thus inducing them to emigrate. That was the condition with which the old nations had to contend. To justify our prosperity as sufficient because it is greater than in these old countries is evading the consideration of our natural advantages.

We have permitted some to come who have not made desirable citizens, but until recently comparatively few such have come, and such are a mere fraction. No careful student denies that a part of the prosperity we boast is due to the immigrants who have come in the full vigor of youth to join us in our industry.

Our prosperity is not so much the result of wise government as it is due to natural conditions over which legislation has exercised no control, but, on the contrary, by the failure has permitted certain interests to acquire exclusive control of the resources, and that control has limited our progress and put up the price of our necessities.

Discriminating freight rates in favor of the railroad centers have created abnormal conditions, extravagance, and overdevelopment in those centers. It has been a great tax on human energy. The energy had to be drawn from the country principally. Farms and villages have been deprived of a large part of their natural advantages. In no way could the work in the cities be done without drawing from the country, so the railways sacrificed the country for the cities.

So many are now engaged in the production of the things that are not consumed by the people in general that not enough of us are left to produce what we do consume. The cities may continue a while longer their enormous outlays and expenditures of our resources, but the limit for the good of the country has passed, and when we realize that we are moving in the wrong direction the course of the population will be turned back to the farms and villages. That will be true conservation and make a more prosperous land and happier people.

Conditions are transitory. We do not know to-day what will occur to-morrow. The forces of yesterday left their impression upon affairs of to-day. Those of this day will lap over into the morrow. Thus the past, present, and future are linked. No new force has come into creation. The differences that take place have been but the varied arrangement of original principles. Almost infinite variety is yet to be tried. These trials will bring us to higher planes. Each failure recognized induces the forces of repair. Thus we have come down through the ages with infinite variety; likewise we are passing through the present, and so we shall go through the future.

We ought not to be discouraged. The succeeding periods bring new and better results. Failures are but temporary. They furnish the inducement to strive to correct whatever is wrong. As a result we should always be inspired with hope, reenforced by our reason. The fact that our course is onward and upward whenever and wherever people come to a better understanding should give us satisfaction. Knowledge is the way by which we shall travel safely.

Many of the new arrangements and the most valuable discoveries made in each decade were ridiculed in the decade previous as the visionary dreams of those who were working out their solution. The mind that harnessed steam and made it work for all men; the mind that sent kites to the sky to play with electricity and plan its harness; the mind that arranged wires to send long-distance messages and to carry even the voice in a whisper across a continent; the mind that contrived the apparatus by which to transmit and receive human messages through trackless space on the air waves; the mind that devised the machines with which men fly; yes, the minds that devised political and social reforms, and more than a thousand other discoveries that serve this generation, were first criticized as the visionary and impractical dreams of persons supposed to have unbalanced brains. Sad, is it not, that those who seek to build for the good of all men should be stamped by the unthinking as calamity howlers and dreamers. And now, after all the examples that history has furnished, we still denounce as visionary the work of those who discover new scientific facts, give the world new inventions, and inaugurate new methods and systems for the common welfare.

But hold for a minute lest we enthuse too greatly over the higher civilization. What has it all resulted in? The great discoveries have constantly amazed and electrified the world. People have advanced more than a hundredfold in economic effectiveness; their mental realization has immensely increased and possible social opportunities enormously enlarged; still there has been no correspondingly equitable individual benefit. As a result of the new order there are a few multimillionaires, but the most of us are striving with difficulty to obtain the bare necessaries of life; and yet, notwithstanding this great difference in the control of the material agencies, there is, perhaps, no difference in the average capacity of intelligence on the part of the poor as distinguished from the rich. Then why should there be such a difference in their life results? This is a fact that I have attempted to explain in part. We should have a committee on industrial relations in this House to deal with this question. The reason I speak now is that I shall press for consideration early in the next session the adoption of a rule to create this important committee. Later a permanent commission may and should be established. Members will readily see its importance.

Knowledge is the means by which we can determine the relations that should be maintained in order to promote the common welfare. How can we have anything even approaching equality of opportunity until we, the people in general, understand the political, economic, and social forces that are in operation. Until we do there will be official, industrial, and social discrimination, and consequently the enormous inequality between people will continue. The few who are informed and understand will use their knowledge to their selfish advantage and keep the rest of us working for them. Why should we continue to follow the same methods that boss politicians, subservient to the interests, have planned for us? Shall we still allow them to continue to employ graft and use patronage in order to serve the interests so that they can get from them campaign funds and other favors? Shall we follow their selfish purposes and tag as "calamity howlers" and "dreamers" those who point the way by which to improve conditions? Shall we fear them and fail to adopt the improved systems proposed in our generation and which would satisfy our most urgent needs? Surely, after all that has passed, we can not believe that we can trust the management of the Government to political bosses who dole out to their favorites all the offices of public trust and to the special interests, favors in the shape of legislation and otherwise. By these methods our greatest material resources have become the property of the specially favored. Surely they should not be allowed to pilot the ship of state. We should no longer be herded by the political bosses within so-called party lines, in order that they may manage the Government. No statesman with the interest of the people at heart, and who has observed in the last few years the traducing of expressed party principles as well as the subversion by party bosses of the machinery of Government to the interests of the few, will say that this is rightly a Government by parties. Those who do state this are either wittingly or unwittingly the spokesmen for the special interests. The political parties in these last years have divided the people. The bosses have controlled the machinery of the parties and regulated them by the caucus system. Further, the caucuses have been divided into factions, each in turn controlled by bosses, so that practically a Government by party proves to be a Government by the special interests. The special interests court the party in control. It matters not to them which party. All they want is that the people should be divided into parties, the parties divided into caucuses, and the caucuses into factions. The strongest faction is generally controlled by the bosses, for the interests always deal with the bosses. As a result he who fights to keep the Government within party control usually fights for the special interests.

Right now is the time for the single voter to begin to exert his undeniable rights. He has seen that party government redounds to the interests of the few. The voter, when he votes in accordance with his own interests, votes in accordance with the interests of the majority of his fellow citizens and against government by bosses. If we would have a Government by and for the people, then it must be essentially a Government by the direction of the voters instead of by political parties, who are in turn governed by the factions and the latter by the bosses. Legislation should never be determined by a political party as such in a separate body from that which has under the laws the responsibility. Political parties may serve most useful purposes through which people may organize for the promotion of reforms, but they do not belong in the halls of legislation as a means of dividing the peoples' representatives into factions, so that a minority instead of a majority of all the peoples' representatives enact laws. That is what is being done in this House now. There are 395 Members, but of this number about 200 have separated themselves from the official House, calling themselves Democrats. They hold caucuses, and what a majority in these caucuses decide the minority yield to. By entering such a body for anything more binding than a fair, honest discussion and conference with a view of clearing up their understanding, amounts to a violation of their oaths. I realize that the Republicans when in power were just as wrong, but that is no justification. That practice creates factional and not national government. Ours is a Nation and we demand a national government.

Mr. SIMS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LINDBERGH. With pleasure, I consent.

Mr. SIMS. I have not had the pleasure of hearing the entire address. Does the gentleman accept the theory or the fact that population is increasing more rapidly than the means for its subsistence? I believe it is called the Malthusian theory.

Mr. LINDBERGH. The natural conditions and the material resources of this country are so great that under any well-regulated order in the application of steam, water power, electric, and other mechanical energy of which people can make use in the production of the necessaries of life there is practically no limit to the population that could be maintained in prosperity, contentment, and happiness.

Nothing is so beautiful as the truth when it stands out prominently in contrast to error. Nothing suggests more clearly the duty of people to themselves and toward each other than a well-regulated family. There all is consistent. Each fills the place in life that is natural, and the parents naturally respond to all the requirements of their children. But they do not allow them to remain dependent beyond the period of childhood, nor do they contemplate becoming dependent upon their children. Each trains to respond to the laws of God, and develops in human sympathy from the purity of his nature, and seeks to fill true purposes in life, and especially to be self-sustaining. The ability of mankind to increase in population without men becoming incumbrances on each other is dependent on the working out of this same principle. It should be bred into children from infancy, and if it were not for the oppression forced upon the family from the errors of society and the failures of government, every well-regulated family would succeed without difficulty.

In my remarks I have shown that very many people are idle and that still more are engaged in occupations that do not produce the necessaries of life nor those things that contribute to the common needs of either themselves or others. These are not self-sustaining. They compete with the rest of us who do produce in consuming the products that are necessary. It is apparent, therefore, that those who are idle and those who are engaged in occupations that do not produce necessaries or furnish conveniences that people in general can enjoy are an incumbrance on the rest of us. That is why all able-bodied persons should be self-sustaining. Of course that does not mean that each person should produce what he eats, wears, or enjoys; but it does mean that he must, in order to be self-sustaining, produce or furnish something that fills the actual needs of humanity. The teacher, for instance, produces no material thing, but does fill a necessary place, therefore comes within the purview of a producer. The same is true of all persons who perform necessary social service, manual and mental, or either.

I do not doubt that at least 3,000,000 of the people residing in and adjacent to the city of New York, practically forming one great city, depend wholly on what others produce for their living, but do not produce anything whatever that supplies the actual needs of humanity. They compete in consuming what all humanity must have, and therefore their demand enables the trusts that control so many of the necessaries to increase their price to all who must buy them. In order to support the 3,000,000, every farmer, every person working for wages, everybody, in fact, who serves the needs of mankind, must give a part of his life effort. There is no escape from it. New York is not an exception except in its magnitude. Everywhere we find the same process in action. Because of that condition the farmer, the wage worker, the salesman, and all others, labor more hours per day and pay more for what they buy. As a result the increase to a prosperous population is limited more than it otherwise would be.

We have not and will not for a long time need to study the Malthusian theory with any idea of applying it to restrict the increase of our population. But we should not delay adjusting the social conditions and applying reforms to the way business is done in order to prevent the enormous waste of our material resources and also to prevent the improper employment of our industrial forces. These have been employed in the production of wealth that supplies capitalists with the means for exploiting the people. That is why the overgrowth of New York City has taken place. That is why a few other cities also have overgrown. We should not only have a committee on industrial relations in this House, but, in addition thereto, a permanant national industrial commission should be created. We should invite the cooperation of all the world in the promotion of the common interests of all humanity.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave which the House granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I herewith insert the speech of Senator ROOT, chairman of the committee to notify President Taft of his renomination by the Republican Party as their candidate for President, and also the speech of President Taft delivered in reply to the notification.

The ceremonies attendant upon the notification took place in the large East Room of the White House to-day and were attended by many prominent Republicans from throughout the country.

SENATOR ROOT'S SPEECH OF NOTIFICATION.

Senator ROOT said:

"Mr. President, the committee of notification here present has the honor to advise you formally that on the 22d day of June last you were regularly and duly nominated by the national convention of the Republican Party to be the Republican candidate for President for the term beginning March 4, 1913.

"For the second time in the history of the Republican Party a part of the delegates have refused to be bound by the action of the convention. Now, as on the former occasion, the irreconcilable minority declares its intention to support either your Democratic opponent or a third candidate. The reason assigned for this course is dissatisfaction with the decision of certain contests in the making up of the temporary roll of the convention. Those contests were decided by the tribunal upon which the law that has governed the Republican Party for more than 40 years imposed the duty of deciding such contests. So long as those decisions were made honestly and in good faith all persons were bound to accept them as conclusive in the making up of the temporary roll of the convention, and neither in the facts and arguments produced before the national committee, the committee on credentials and the convention itself, nor otherwise, does there appear just ground for impeaching the honesty and good faith of the committee's decisions. Both the making up of the temporary roll and the rights accorded to the persons upon that roll, whose seats were contested, were in accordance with the long-established and unquestioned rules of law governing the party, and founded upon justice and common sense. Your title to the nomination is as clear and unimpeachable as the title of any candidate of any party since political conventions began.

"REPRESENTATIVE OF REPUBLICAN PRINCIPLES.

"Your selection has a broader basis than a mere expression of choice between different party leaders representing the same ideas. You have been nominated because you stand preeminently for certain fixed and essential principles which the Republican Party maintains. You believe in preserving the constitutional Government of the United States. You believe in the rule of law rather than the rule of men. You realize that the only safety for nations, as for individuals, is to establish and abide by declared principles of action. You are in sympathy with the great practical rules of right conduct that the American people have set up for their own guidance and self-restraint in the limitations of the Constitution—the limitations upon governmental and official power essential to the preservation of liberty and justice. You know that to sweep away these wise rules of self-restraint would be not progress, but decadence. You know that the great declarations of principle in our Constitution can not be made an effectual guide to conduct in any other way than by judicial judgment upon attempts to violate them; and you maintain the independence, dignity, and authority of the courts of the United States. You are for progress along all the lines of national development, but for progess which still preserves the good we already have and holds fast to those essential elements of American institutions which have made our country prosperous and great and free. You represent the spirit of kindly consideration by every American citizen toward all his fellows, respect for the right of adverse opinion, peaceable methods of settling differences—the spirit and the method which make ordered and peaceful self-government possible, as distinguished from intolerance and hatred and violence.

"In respect of all these things our country is threatened from many sides. It is your high privilege to be the standard-bearer for the cause in which you believe; and in that cause of peace and justice and liberty the millions of your countrymen who believe as you do will stand with you, and the great party which was born in the struggle for constitutional freedom will support you."

PRESIDENT TAFT'S SPEECH OF ACCEPTANCE.

"Mr. ROOT and gentlemen of the notification committee, I accept the nomination which you tender. I do so with profound gratitude to the Republican Party, which has thus honored me twice. I accept it as an approval of what I have done under its mandate, and as an expression of confidence that in a second administration I will serve the public well. The issue presented to the convention, over which your chairman presided with such a just and even hand, made a crisis in the party's life. A faction sought to force the party to violate a valuable and time-honored national tradition by intrusting the power of the Presidency for more than two terms to one man, and that man one whose recently avowed political views would have committed the party to radical proposals involving dangerous changes in our present constitutional form of representative government and our independent judiciary.

"This occasion is appropriate for the expression of profound gratitude at the victory for the right which was won at Chicago. By that victory the Republican Party was saved for future usefulness. It has been the party through which substantially all the progress and development in our country's history in the last 50 years has been finally effected. It carried the country through the war which saved the Union, and through the greenback and silver crazes to a sound gold basis, which saved the country's honor and credit. It fought the Spanish War and successfully solved the new problems of our island possessions. It met the incidental evils of the enormous trade expansion and extended combinations of capital from 1897 until now by a successful crusade against the attempt of concentrated wealth to control the country's politics and its trade. It enacted regulatory legislation to make the railroads the servants and not the masters of the people. It has enforced the antitrust laws until those who were not content with anything but monopolistic control of various branches of industry are now acquiescent in any plan which shall give them scope for legitimate expansion and assure them immunity from reckless prosecution.

"The Republican Party has been alive to the modern change in the view of the duty of government toward the people. Time was when the least government was thought the best, and the policy which left all to the individual, unmolested and unaided by government, was deemed the wisest. Now the duty of government by positive law to further equality of opportunity in respect of the weaker classes in their dealings with the stronger and more powerful is clearly recognized. It is in this direction that real progress toward the greater human happiness is being made. It has been suggested that under our Constitution such tendency to so-called paternalism was impossible. Nothing is further from the fact. The power of the Federal Government to tax and expend for the general welfare has long been exercised, and the admiration one feels for our Constitution is increased when we perceive how readily that instrument lends itself to wider governmental functions in the promotion of the comfort of the people.

"The list of legislative enactments for the uplifting of those of our people suffering a disadvantage in their social and economic relation, enacted by the Republican Party in this and previous administrations, is a long one, and shows the party sensitive to the needs of the people under the new view of governmental responsibility.

"Thus there was the pure-food law and the meat-inspection law to hold those who dealt with the food of millions to a strict accountability for its healthful conditions.

"The frightful loss of life and limb to railway employees in times past has now been greatly reduced by statutes requiring safety appliances and proper inspection, of which two important ones were passed in this administration.

"The dreadful mining disasters in which thousands of miners met their death have led to a Federal mining bureau and generous appropriations to further discovery of methods for reducing explosions and other dangers in mining.

"The statistics as to infant mortality and as to the too early employment of children in factories have prompted the creation of a children's bureau, by which the whole public can be made aware of actual conditions in the States and the best methods of reforming them for the saving and betterment of the coming generation.

"The passage of time has brought the burdens and helplessness of old age to many of those veterans of the Civil War who exposed their lives in the supreme struggle to save the Nation, and recognizing this, Congress has added to previous provision which patriotic gratitude had prompted a substantial allowance, which may be properly characterized as an old man's pension.

"By the white-slave act we have sought to save unfortunates from their own degradation, and have forbidden the use of interstate commerce in promoting vice.

"In the making of the contract of employment between a railway employee and the company the two do not stand on an equality, and the terms of the contract which the common law implied were unfair to the employee. Congress, in the exercise of its control over interstate commerce, has re-formed the contract to be implied and has made it more favorable to the employee. Indeed, a more radical bill, which I fully approve, has passed the Senate and is now pending in the House which requires interstate railways, in effect, to insure the lives of their employees and to make provision for prompt settlement of the amount due under the law after death or injury has occurred.

"By the railroad legislation of this administration shippers have been placed much nearer an equality with the railroads whose lines they use than ever before. Rates can not be increased except after the Interstate Commerce Commission shall hold the increase reasonable. Orders against railways which under previous acts might be stayed by judicial injunction that involved a delay of two years can now be examined and finally passed on by the Commerce Court in about six months. Patrons of express, telegraph, and telephone companies may now secure reasonable rates by complaint to the commission.

"Many millions are spent annually by the Department of Agriculture to investigate the best methods of treating the soil, carrying on agriculture, and publishing the results. We are now looking into the question of the best system for securing such credit for the farmer at reasonable rates as will enable him better to equip his farm and to follow the rules of good farming, which we must encourage. Our platform, I am glad to say, specifies this as a reform to which the party is pledged. The necessity for stimulating greater production of foodstuffs per acre becomes imperative as the vacant lands available for the extension of acreage are filling up and the supply of foodstuffs as compared with the demand is growing less each year.

"Congress has sought to encourage the movement toward eight hours a day for all manual labor by the recent enactment of a new law on the subject more stringent in its provisions regarding works on Government contracts.

"One of the great defects in our present system of government is the delay and expense of litigation, which of course works against the poor litigant. The Supreme Court is now engaged in a revision of the equity rules to minimize delay and expense as to half our Federal litigation. The workmen's compensation act will relieve our courts of law of a very heavy part of the present dockets on the law side of the court and give the court more opportunity to speed the remaining causes. The last Congress codified the Federal court provisions, and we may look for, and should insist upon, a reform in the law procedure so as to promote dispatch of business and reduction in costs.

"We have adopted in this administration, after very considerable opposition, the postal savings banks, which work directly in the promotion of thrift among the people. By reason of the payment of only 2 per cent interest on deposits they do not compete with the savings banks. But they do attract those who fear banks and are unwilling to trust their funds except to a governmental agency. Experience, however, leads depositors to a knowledge of the importance of interest, and then seeking a higher rate they transfer their accounts to the savings banks. In this way the savings-bank deposits, instead of being reduced, are increased, and there is thus available a much larger fund for general investment.

"For some years the administration has been recommending the parcel post, and now I am glad to say a measure will probably be adopted by Congress authorizing the Government to avail itself of the existing machinery of the Post Office Department to carry parcels at a reasonably low rate, so that the communication between the city and the country in ordinary merchandise will be proportionately as low priced and as prompt as the newspaper and letter delivery through the post offices now. This must contribute greatly to reducing the cost and increasing the comfort of living.

"We are considering the changing needs of the people in the disposition of our public lands and their conservation. As those lands owned by the Government and useful for agricultural purposes which remain are as a whole less desirable as homesteads than those which have been already settled, it has been properly thought wise to reduce the time for perfecting a homestead claim from five years to three, and this whether on land within the rain area or in those arid tracts within the reclamation districts.

"Again, a bill has passed the Senate and is likely to pass the House which will not compel the settlers on reclamation lands to wait 10 years and until full payment of what they owe the Government before they receive a title, but which gives a title after three years with a first Government lien.

"On the other hand, the withdrawal of coal lands, phosphate lands, and oil lands and water-power sites is still maintained until Congress shall provide, on the principles of proper conservation, a system of disposition which will attract capital on the one hand and retain sufficient control by the Government on the other to prevent the evil of concentrating absolute ownership in a few persons of those sources for the production of necessities.

"POPULAR UNREST.

"In the work of rousing the people to the danger that threatened our civilization from the abuses of concentrated wealth and the power it was likely to exercise, the public imagination was wrought upon and a reign of sensational journalism and unjust and unprincipled muckraking has followed, in which much injustice has been done to honest men. Demagogues have seized the opportunity further to inflame the public mind and have sought to turn the peculiar conditions to their advantage.

"We are living in an age in which by exaggeration of the defects of our present condition, by false charges of responsibility for it against individuals and classes, by holding up to the feverish imagination of the less fortunate and the discontented the possibilities of a millennium, a condition of popular unrest has been produced. New parties are being formed, with the avowed purpose of satisfying this unrest by promising a panacea. In so far as inequality of condition can be lessened and equality of opportunity can be promoted by improvement of our educational system, the betterment of the laws to insure the quick administration of justice, and by the prevention of the acquisition of privilege without just compensation, in so far as the adoption of the legislation above recited and laws of a similar character may aid the less fortunate in their struggle with the hardships of life, all are in sympathy with a continued effort to remedy injustice and to aid the weak, and I venture to say that there is no national administration in which more real steps of such progress have been taken than in the present one. But in so far as the propaganda for the satisfaction of unrest involves the promise of a millennium, a condition in which the rich are to be made reasonably poor and the poor reasonably rich by law, we are chasing a phantom; we are holding out to those whose unrest we fear a prospect and a dream, a vision of the impossible.

"In the ultimate analysis, I fear, the equal opportunity which is sought by many of those who proclaim the coming of so-called social justice involves a forced division of property, and that means socialism. In the abuses of the last two decades it is true that ill-gotten wealth has been concentrated in some undeserving hands, and if it were possible to redistribute it on any equitable principle to those from whom it was taken without adequate or proper compensation, it would be a good result to bring about. But this is obviously impossible and impracticable. All that can be done is to treat this as one incidental evil of a great expansive movement in the material progress of the world and to make sure that there will be no recurrence of such evil. In this regard we have made great progress and reform, as in respect to secret rebates in railways, the improper conferring of public franchises, and the immunity of monopolizing trusts and combinations. The misfortunes of ordinary business, the division of the estates of wealthy men at their death, the chance of speculation which undue good fortune seems often to stimulate, operating as causes through a generation, will do much to divide up such large fortunes. It is far better to await the diminution of this evil by natural causes than to attempt what would soon take on the aspect of confiscation or to abolish the principle and institution of private property and to change to socialism. Socialism involves the taking away of the motive for acquisition, saving, energy, and enterprise, and a futile attempt by committees to apportion the rewards due for productive labor. It means stagnation and retrogression. It destroys the mainspring of human action that has carried the world on and upward for 2,000 years.

"I do not say that the two gentlemen who now lead, one the Democratic Party and the other the former Republicans who have left their party, in their attacks upon existing conditions, and in their attempt to satisfy the popular unrest by promises of remedies, are consciously embracing socialism. The truth is that they do not offer any definite legislation or policy by which the happy conditions they promise are to be brought about; but if their promises mean anything, they lead directly toward the appropriation of what belongs to one man to another. The truth is, my friends, both those who have left the Republican Party under the inspiration of their present leader, and our old opponents, the Democrats, under their candidate, are going in a direction they do not definitely know, toward an end they can not definitely describe, with but one chief and clear object, and that is of acquiring power for their party by popular support through the promise of a change for the better. What they clamor for is a change. They ask for a change in Government so that the Government may be restored to the people, as if this had not been a people's Government since the beginning of the Constitution. I have the fullest sympathy with every reform in governmental and election machinery which shall facilitate the expression of the popular will, as the short ballot and the reduction in the number of elective offices to make it possible. But these gentlemen propose to reform the Government, whose present defects, if any, are due to the failure of the people to devote as much time as is necessary to their political duties, by requiring a political activity by the people three times that which thus far the people have been willing to assume; and thus their remedies, instead of exciting the people to further interest and activity in the Government, will tire them into such an indifference as still further to remand control of public affairs to a minority.

"But after we have changed all the governmental machinery so as to permit instantaneous expression of the people in constitutional amendments, in statutes, and in recall of public agents, what then? Votes are not bread, constitutional amendments are not work, referendums do not pay rent or furnish houses, recalls do not furnish clothing, initiatives do not supply employment or relieve inequalities of condition or of opportunity. We still ought to have set before us the definite plans to bring on complete equality of opportunity and to abolish hardship and evil for humanity. We listen for them in vain.

"Instead of giving us the benefit of any specific remedies for the hardships and evils of society they point out, they follow their urgent appeals for closer association of the people in legislation by an attempt to cultivate the hostility of the people to the courts and to represent them as in some form upholding injustice and obstructing the popular will. Attempts are made to take away all those safeguards for maintaining the independence of the judiciary which are so carefully framed in our Constitution. These attempts find expression in the policy, on the one hand, of the recall of judges, a system under which a judge whose decision in one case may temporarily displease the electorate is to be deprived at once of his office by a popular vote, a pernicious system embodied in the Arizona constitution and which the Democrats of the House and Senate refused to condemn as the initial policy of a new State. The same spirit manifested itself in the vote by Democratic Senators on the proposition, first, to abolish the Commerce Court, and, second, to abolish judges by mere act of repeal, although under the Constitution their terms are for life, on no ground except that they did not like some of the court's recent decisions. Another form of hostility to the judiciary is shown in the grotesque proposition by the leader of former Republicans who have left their party, for a recall of decisions, so that a decision on a point of constitutional law, having been rendered by the highest court capable of rendering it, shall then be submitted to popular vote to determine whether it ought to be sustained. Again, the Democratic Party in Congress and convention shows its desire to weaken the courts by forbidding the use of the writ of injunction to protect a lawful business against the destructive effect of a secondary boycott and by interposing a jury in contempt proceedings brought to enforce the court's order and decrees. These provisions are really class legislation designed to secure immunity for lawlessness in labor disputes on the part of the laborers, but operating much more widely to paralyze the arm of the court in cases which do not involve labor disputes at all. The hostility to the judiciary and the measures to take away its power and its independence constitute the chief definite policy that can be fairly attributed to that class of statesmen and reformers whose control the Republican Party escaped at Chicago and to whom the Democratic Party yielded at Baltimore.

"The Republican Party stands for none of these innovations. It refuses to make changes simply for the purpose of making a change, and cultivating popular hope that in the change something beneficial, undefined, will take place. It does not believe that human nature has changed. It still believes it is possible in this world that the fruits of energy, courage, enterprise, attention to duty, hard work, thrift, providence, restraint of appetite and of passions will continue to have their reward under our present system, and that laziness, lack of attention, lack of industry, the yielding to appetite and passion, carelessness, dishonesty, and disloyalty will ultimately find their own punishment in the world here. We do not deny that there are exceptions, and that seeming fortune follows wickedness and misfortune virtue, but, on the whole, we are optimists and believe that the rule is the other way. We do not know any way to avoid human injustice except to perfect our laws for administering justice, to develop the morality of the individual, to give direct supervision and aid to those who are, or are likely to be, oppressed, and to give as full scope as possible to individual efforts and its rewards. Wherever we can see that a statute which does not deprive any person or class of what is his is going to help many people, we are in favor of it. We favor the greatest good to the greatest number, but we do not believe that this can be accomplished by minimizing the rewards of individual effort, or by infringing or destroying the right of property, which, next to the right of liberty, has been and is the greatest civilizing institution in history. In other words, the Republican Party believes in progress along the lines upon which we have attained progress already. We do not believe that we can reach a millennium by a sudden change in all our existing institutions. We believe that we have made progress from the beginning until now, and that the progress is to continue into the far future; that it is reasonable progress that experience has shown to be really useful and helpful, and from which there is no reaction to something worse.

"The Republican Party stands for the Constitution as it is, with such amendments adopted according to its provisions as new conditions thoroughly understood may require. We believe that it has stood the test of time, and that there have been disclosed really no serious defects in its operation.

"It is said this is not an issue in the campaign. It seems to me it is the supreme issue. The Democratic Party and the former Republicans who have left their party are neither of them to be trusted on this subject, as I have shown. The Republican Party is the nucleus of that public opinion which favors constant progress and development along safe and sane lines and under the Constitution as we have had it for more than 100 years, and which believes in the maintenance of an independent judiciary as the keystone of our liberties and the balance wheel by which the whole governmental machinery is kept within the original plan.

"WHAT THE ADMINISTRATION HAS DONE.

"The normal and logical question which ought to be asked and answered in determining whether an administration should be continued in power is, How has the Government been administered? Has it been economical and efficient? Has it aided or obstructed business prosperity? Has it made for progress in bettering the condition of the people and especially of the wage earner? Ought its general policies to approve themselves to the people?

"During this administration we have given special attention to the machinery of government with a view to increasing its efficiency and reducing its cost. For 20 years there has been a continuous expansion in every direction of the governmental functions and a necessary increase in the civil and military servants by which these functions are performed. The expenditures of the Government have normally increased from year to year on an average of nearly 4 per cent. There never has been a systematic investigation and reorganization of this governmental structure with a view to eliminating duplications, to uniting bureaus where union is possible and more effective, and to making the whole organization more compact and its parts more closely coordinated. As a beginning, we examined closely the estimates. These, unless watched, grow from year to year under the natural tendency of the bureau chiefs. The first estimates which were presented to us we cut some $50,000,000, and this policy we have maintained through the administration and have prevented the normal annual increase in Government expenditures, so the result is that the deficit of $58,735,000, which we found on the 1st of July, 1909, was changed on the 1st of July, 1910, by increase of the revenues under the Payne law, including the corporation tax, to a surplus of $15,806,000; on July 1, 1911, to a surplus of $47,234,000; and on July 1, 1912, to a surplus of $36,336,000. The expenditures for 1909 were $662,324,000; for 1910, $659,705,000; for 1911, $654,138,000; and for 1912, $654,804,000. These figures of surplus and expenditure do not include any receipts or expenditures on account of the Panama Canal.

"I secured an appropriation for the appointment of an Economy and Efficiency Commission, consisting of the ablest experts in the country, and they have been working for two years on the question of how the Government departments may be reorganized and what changes can be made with a view to giving them greater effectiveness for governmental purposes on the one hand and securing this at considerably less cost on the other. I have transmitted to Congress from time to time the recommendations of this commission, and while they can not all be adopted at one session, and while their recommendations have not been rounded and complete because of the necessity for taking greater time, I think that the Democratic Appropriations Committee of the House has become convinced that we are on the right road and that substantial reform may be effected through the adoption of most of the plans recommended by this commission.

"PANAMA CANAL.

"For the benefit of our own people and of the world we have carried on the work of the Panama Canal so that we can now look forward with confidence to its completion within 18 months. The work has been a remarkable one, and has involved the expenditure of $30,000,000 to $40,000,000 annually for a series of years, and yet it has been attended with no scandal, and with a development of such engineering and medical skill and ingenuity as to command the admiration of the world and to bring the highest credit to our Corps of Army Engineers and our Army Medical Corps.

"FOREIGN RELATIONS.

"In our foreign relations we have maintained peace everywhere and sought to promote its continuance and permanence.

"We have renewed the Japanese treaty for 12 more years and have avoided certain difficulties that were supposed to be insuperable as between the two countries by an arrangement which satisfies both.

"We negotiated certain broad treaties for the promotion of universal arbitration which, if they had been ratified, would have greatly contributed toward perfecting machinery for securing general peace. The Democratic minority of the Senate withheld the necessary two-thirds vote, and amended the treaties in such a way as to make it doubtful whether they are worth preserving.

"In China we have exercised a beneficial influence as one of the powers interested in aiding that great country in its forward movement and in its effort to establish and maintain popular government. In order that our influence might be useful, we have acted with the other great powers and have exercised our influence effectively toward the strengthening of the popular movement and giving the Republic governmental stability. We have lent our good offices in the negotiation of a loan essential to the continuance of the Republic and which we hope that China will accept under such conditions of supervision as are adequate to the security of the lenders and at the same time will be of great assistance to those in whose behalf the loan is made, the people of China.

"Our Mexican neighbor on the south has been disturbed by two revolutions, and these have necessarily brought a strain upon our relations because of the losses sustained by American citizens, both in property and in life, due to the lawlessness which could not be prevented under conditions of civil war. The pressure for intervention at times has been great, and grounds upon which, it is said, we might have intervened have been urged upon us, but this administration has been conscious that one hostile step in intervention and the passing of the border by one regiment of troops would mean war with Mexico, the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars, the loss of thousands of lives in the tranquilization of that country, with all the subsequent problems that would arise as to its disposition after we found ourselves in complete armed possession.

"In order to avoid the plain consequences, it seemed the course of patriotism and of wisdom to subject ourselves and our citizens to some degree of suffering and inconvenience and to pass over with a strong protest and a claim for damages even those injuries inflicted on our peaceful citizens in our own territory along the border by flying bullets in engagements between the governmental and the revolutionary forces on the Mexican side. It is easy to arouse popular indignation over an instance of this character. It is easy to take advantage of it for the purpose of justifying aggressive action, and it is easy to cultivate political support and popularity by a warlike and truculent policy, but with the familiarity that we have had in the carrying on of such a war in the Philippines and in Cuba, no one with a sense of responsibility to the American people would involve them in the almost unending burden and thankless task of enforcing peace upon these 15,000,000 of people fighting among themselves when they would necessarily all turn against us at the first manifestation of our purpose to intervene. I am very sure that the course of self-restraint the administration has pursued in respect to Mexico will vindicate itself in the pages of history.

"I am hopeful that the present Government is now rapidly subduing the insurrection, and that we may look for tranquillity near at hand. The demonstration of force which I felt compelled to make in the early part of the disturbance, by the mobilization of some 15,000 or 20,000 troops in Texas, and holding maneuvers there, had a good and direct effect and, as our ambassador and consuls report, secured much increased respect for American and other foreign property in the disturbances that followed. Similar questions have arisen in Cuba, but we have been able to avoid intervention and to aid and encourage that young Republic by suggestion and advice.

"I am glad to believe that we have had more peace in the Central American Republics because of our attention to their needs and our activity in mediating between them than ever before in the history of those Republics.

"THE NAVY.

"The dignity and effectiveness of the Government of the United States, together with its responsibility for the protection of Hawaii, Porto Rico, Alaska, Panama, and the Philippines, as well as for the upholding of the Monroe doctrine, require the maintenance of an Army and a Navy. We can not properly reduce either below its present effective size. The plan for the maintenance of the Navy in proportion to the growth of other navies of the world calls for the construction of two new battleships each year. The Republican Party has felt the responsibility and voted the ships. The Democratic Party, in House caucus, repudiates any obligation to meet this national need.

"THE PHILIPPINES.

"The Philippines have had popular government and much prosperity during this administration in view of the free trade which they have enjoyed under the Payne bill. The continuance of the same policy with respect to the Philippines will make the prosperity of those islands greater and greater and will gradually fit their people for self-government, and nothing will prevent such results except the ill-advised policy proposed by the Democratic Party of holding before the Philippine people independence as a prospect of the immediate future.

"OUR FOREIGN TRADE.

"During this administration everything possible has been done to increase our foreign trade, and under the Payne bill the maximum and minimum clause furnished the opportunity for insisting upon the removal by foreign countries of discriminations in that trade, so that the statistics show that our exports and imports reached for the year ending July 1, 1912, a higher figure than ever before in the history of the country. Our imports for the last fiscal year, ending July 1, 1912, amounted to $1,653,426,174 and our exports to $2,049,320,199, or a total of $3,857,648,262. If there were added to this the business done with Porto Rico, Hawaii, and the Philippines, the sum total of our foreign trade would considerably exceed $4,000,000,000. The excess of our exports over imports is $550,795,914. Manufactures exported during the year 1912 exceed $1,000,000,000 and surpass the previous record. These figures seem to show that the business is large enough to produce prosperity, and the fact is that it has done so.

"PROTECTIVE TARIFF.

"The platform of 1908 promised, on behalf of the Republican Party, to do certain things. One was that the tariff would be revised at an extra session. An extra session was called and the tariff was revised. The platform did not say in specific words that the revision would be generally downward, but I construed it to mean that. During the pendency of the bill and after it was passed it was subjected to the most vicious misrepresentation. It was said to be a bill to increase the tariff rather than to reduce it. The law has been in force now since August, 1909, a period of about 35 months. We are able to judge from its operation how far the statement is true that it did reduce duties.

"It has vindicated itself. Under its operation, prosperity has been gradually restored since the panic of 1907. There have been no disastrous failures and no disastrous strikes. The percentage of reduction below the Dingley bill is shown in the larger free list and in the lower percentage of the tariff collected on the total value of the goods imported. The figures show that under the Dingley bill, which was in force 144 months, the average per cent of the imports that came in free was in value 44.3 per cent of the total importations, and that under the Payne bill, which has been in force 35 months, the average per cent in value of the imports which have come in free amounts to 51.2 per cent of the total; that the average ad valorem of the duties on dutiable goods under the 12 years of the Dingley bill was 45.8 per cent, while under the 35 months of the Payne bill this was 41.2 per cent, and that the average ad valorem of duties on all the imports under the Dingley bill was 25.5 per cent, while under the Payne bill it was 20.1 per cent. In other words, considering only reductions on dutiable goods, the reduction in duties from the Dingley bill to the Payne bill was 10 per cent, and considering reductions on all imports, it amounted to 21 per cent.

"Under the provisions of the Payne bill I was able to appoint a Tariff Board to make investigations into each schedule with a view to determining the cost of production here and the cost of production abroad of the articles named in the schedule, in order to enable Congress in adjusting this schedule to know what rate of duty was necessary to prevent a destructive competition from European countries and the closing up of our mills and other sources of production. We are living on an economic basis established on principles of protection. A large part of our products are dependent for existence upon a rate of duty sufficient to save the producer from foreign competition which would make the continuance of his business impossible. In the making of the Payne bill Congress did not have the advantage of the report of the Tariff Board showing the exact facts. If it had, the bill would have been constructed on a better basis, but we now have had the Tariff Board working and it has made a report on the production of wool and the manufacture of woolens in this country and abroad, and has compiled and made public similar data as to the manufacture of cotton goods. If the Republican Party had control of the House of Representatives, there would be no difficulty now in passing a woolen bill like those which have been presented by the Republicans in both houses of Congress reducing the duty on wool and on woolens to such a degree as not to include more than enough to enable the grower of wool and the woolen industry to live and produce a reasonable profit. The same thing could be done with respect to the cotton industry. On the other hand, our opponents, the Democrats, presented to me for my signature a woolen bill and a cotton bill both of which if allowed to become laws, as the reports of the Tariff Board show, would have made such a radical cut in the rates on many woolen and cotton manufactures as seriously to interfere with these industries in this country. This would have forced a transfer of the manufacture to England and Germany and other foreign countries.

"THE RESULT OF DEMOCRATIC SUCCESS.

"If the result of the election were to put the Democrats completely in control of all branches of the Government, then we should look for the reduction of duties upon all those articles which need protection, and may anticipate a serious injury to a large part of our manufacturing industry. We would not have to wait for actual legislation on this subject; the very prospect of Democratic success when its policy toward our great protected industries became understood would postpone indefinitely the coming of prosperity and tend to give us a recurrence of the hard times that we had between 1890 and 1897. The Democratic platform declares protection to be unconstitutional, although it has been the motive and purpose of most tariff bills since 1789, and thus indicates as clearly as possible the intention to depart from a protective policy at once. It is true the Democratic platform says that the change to the policy of a revenue tariff is to be made in such a way as not to injure industry. This is utterly impossible when we are on a protective basis; and it is conclusively shown to be so by the necessary effect of bills already introduced and passed by the Democratic House for the purpose of making strides toward a revenue tariff. It is now more than 15 years since the people of this country have had an experience in such a change as that which the coming in of the Democratic Party would involve. It ought to be brought home to the people as clearly as possible that a change of economic policy such as that which is deliberately proposed in the Democratic platform would halt many of our manufacturing enterprises and throw many wage earners out of employment, would injure much the home markets which the farmers now enjoy for their products, and produce a condition of suffering among the people that no reforming legislation could neutralize or mitigate.

"THE HIGH COST OF LIVING AND THE PAYNE LAW.

"The statement has been widely circulated and has received considerable support from political opponents that the tariff act of 1909 is a chief factor in the high cost of living. This is not true. A careful investigation will show that the phenomenon of increased prices and cost of living is world-wide in its extent and quite as much in evidence in other countries of advanced civilization and progressive tendencies as in our own. Bitter complaints of the burden of increased prices and cost of living have been made not only in this country and Europe, but also in countries of Asia and Africa. Disorder and even riots have occurred in several European cities because of the unprecedented cost of food products. In our own country changes have been manifested without regard to lower or higher duties in the tariff act of 1909. Indeed, the most notable increase in prices has been in the case of products where no duties are imposed, and in some instances in which they were diminished or removed by the recent tariff act.

"It is difficult to understand how any legislation vaguely promised in a political platform can remedy this universal condition. I have recommended the creation of a commission to study this subject and to report upon all possible methods for alleviating the hardship of which the people complain, but great economic tendencies, notable among which are the practically universal movement from the country to the city and the increased supply of gold have been the most potent factors in causing high prices. These facts every careful student of the situation must admit.

"EFFECT OF EXCESSIVE TARIFF RATES.

"There is one respect in which high tariff rates may make for exorbitant prices. If the rate is higher than the difference between the cost of production here and abroad, then it tempts the manufacturers of this country to secure monopoly of the industry and to increase prices as far as the excessive tariff will permit. The danger may be avoided in two ways: First, by carefully adjusting the tariff on articles needing protection so that the manufacturer secures only enough protection to pay the scale of high wages which obtains and ought to obtain in this country and secure a reasonable profit from the business. This may be done by the continuance of the Tariff Board's investigation into the facts, which will enable Congress and the people to know what the tariff as to each schedule ought to be. The American public may rest assured that should the Republican Party be restored to power in all legislative branches all the schedules in the present tariff of which complaint is made will be subjected to investigation and report without delay by a competent and impartial Tariff Board and to the reduction or change which may be necessary to square the rates with the facts.

"The other method of avoiding danger of excessive prices from excessive duties is to enforce the antitrust laws against those who combine to take advantage of the excessive tariff rates. This brings me to the discussion of the Sherman Act.

"ANTITRUST LAW.

"The antitrust law was passed to provide against the organization and maintenance of combinations for the manufacture and sale of commodities, which through restraint of trade, either by contract and agreement or by various methods of unfair competition, should suppress competition, establish monopoly, and control prices. The measure has been on the statute book since 1890, and many times under construction by the courts, but not until the litigation against the Standard Oil Co. and against the American Tobacco Co. reached the Supreme Court did the statute receive an authoritative construction which is workable and intelligible.

"NEW CONSTRUCTIVE LEGISLATION.

"It would aid the business public if specific acts of unfair trade which characterize the establishment of unlawful monopolies should be denounced as misdemeanors for the purpose, first, of making plainer to the public what must be avoided; and, second, for the purpose of punishing such acts by summary procedure without the necessity for the formidable array of witnesses and the lengthy trials essential to establish a general conspiracy under the present act. But there is great need for other constructive legislation of a helpful kind. Combination of capital in great enterprises should be encouraged, if within the law, for everyone must recognize that progress in modern business is by effective combination of the means of production to the point of greatest economy. It should be our purpose, therefore, to put large interstate business enterprises acting within the law on a basis of security by offering them a Federal corporation law under which they may voluntarily incorporate. Such an act is not an easy one to draw in detail, but its general outlines are clearly defined by the two objects of such a law. One is to secure for the public, through competent Government agency, such a close supervision and regulation of the business transactions of the corporation as to preclude a violation of the antitrust and other laws to which the business of the corporation must square, and the other is to furnish to business, thus incorporated and lawfully conducted, the protection and security which it must enjoy under such a Federal charter. With the faculties conferred by such a charter, corporations could do business in all the States without complying with conflicting exactions of State legislatures, and could be sure of uniform taxation—that is, uniform with that imposed by the State on State corporations in the same business.

"OPPOSED TO PROPOSED DRASTIC AMENDMENTS.

"I am not in sympathy with the purpose to make the antitrust law more drastic by such a provision as is proposed by the Democratic majority of the investigating committee of the House for imposing a rule as to burden of proof upon defendants under antitrust prosecutions different from that which defendants in other prosecutions enjoy. This can not be suggested by any difficulty found in proving to the courts the illegality of such combinations when the illegality exists. I challenge the production of a single record in any case in which an objectionable combination has escaped a decree against it because of any favorable rule as to the burden of proof. It is true that many defendants in criminal cases have escaped by a failure of the jury to convict, but that arises from the reluctance and refusal of jurors to find verdicts upon which men are likely to be sent to the penitentiary for pursuing a course in business competition which the ordinary man did not regard as immoral or criminal before the passage of the act.

"CONSISTENT COURSE IN PROSECUTION OF THE LAW.

"I think I may affirm without contradiction that the prosecution of all persons reported to the Department of Justice to have violated the antitrust law has been carried on in this administration without fear or favor, and that everyone who has violated it, no matter how prominent or how great his influence, has been brought before the bar of the court either in civil or criminal suit to answer the charge.

"It is the custom of those who find it to their political interest to do so to sneer at, as innocuous, the decrees against the American Tobacco Co. and against the Standard Oil Co., and the administration is condemned in the Democratic platform for consenting to a compromise in the Standard Oil case. There was no compromise. The Standard Oil decree was entered by the circuit court, and then by the Supreme Court, on the prayer of the Government contained in the original bill filed in a previous administration. The decree in the Tobacco case was reached after a full discussion and entered by the circuit court, consisting of four circuit judges, as a proper decree, and the Government refused to appeal from it because it did not feel that it had grounds upon which to base such an appeal. Both decrees are working well. Both decrees have introduced competition, the one into branches of the tobacco business and the other into branches of the oil business. They have not reintroduced ruinous competition, but they have affected certain prices in such a way as to show the presence of real competition. The division of the two trusts by the decrees into several companies was not expected to show immediate radical change in the business. It may take some years to show all the benefits of the dissolution, but the limitations of the decrees in those two cases are so specific as to make altogether impossible a resumption of the old combination against which the decrees were entered. Even if experience shall show the decrees to be inadequate, full opportunity in future litigation will be afforded to supply the defects.

"The contest has been a long one. For years the rule laid down in the statute was ignored and laughed at, but the power of courts of justice pursuing quietly the law and enforcing it whenever opportunity arose has finally convinced the business public that the antitrust law means something, and that the policy of the administration in enforcing it means something. A number of these combinations illegally organized and maintained are now coming forward admitting their illegality and seeking a decree of dissolution, injunction, and settlement. They are quite prepared to square with that policy, provided it be definitely understood that it be impartially enforced and that security shall attend compliance with the law. My belief is that these decrees mark the beginning of a new era in industrial development; that what the great corporations of the country now desire is not what they manifestly did 20 years ago, to wit, to obtain a monopoly in each business, but it is to maintain a large enough plant to secure the greatest economy in production on the one hand and to avoid the danger of the threats of prosecution and disturbance of their business on the other. It will be the work of the highest statesmanship to secure these ends, and the Republican Party if given the power will accomplish it.

"CONCLUSION.

"I have thus outlined, Mr. ROOT and gentlemen, what I consider to be the chief issues of this campaign. There are others of importance, but time does not permit me to discuss them. In accordance with the usual custom I reserve the opportunity to supplement these remarks in a letter to be addressed to you at a later date, when the alignments of the campaign may require further discussion.

"For the present it is sufficient for me to say that it is greatly in the interest of the people to maintain the solidarity of the Republican Party for future usefulness and to continue it and its policies in control of the destinies of the Nation. I can not think that the American people, after the scrutiny and education of a three months' campaign, during which they will be able to see through the fog of misrepresentation and demagoguery, will fail to recognize that the two great issues which are here presented to them are, first, whether we shall retain, on a sound and permanent basis, our popular constitutional representative form of government, with the independence of the judiciary as necessary to the preservation of those liberties that are the inheritance of centuries, and, second, whether we shall welcome prosperity which is just at our door by maintaining our present economic business basis and by the encouragement of business expansion and progress through legitimate use of capital.

"I know that in this wide country there are many who call themselves Democrats, who view, with the same aversion that we Republicans do, the radical propositions of change in our form of government that are recklessly advanced to satisfy what is supposed to be popular clamor. They are men who revere the Constitution and the institutions of their Government with all the love and respect that we could possibly have, men who deprecate disturbance in business conditions, and are yearning for that quiet from demagogic agitation which is essential to the enjoyment by the whole people of the great prosperity which the good crops and the present conditions ought to bring to us. To them I appeal, as to all Republicans, to join us in an earnest effort to avert the political and economic revolution and business paralysis which Republican defeat will bring about. Such misfortune will fall most heavily on the wage earner. May we not hope that he will see what his real interest is, will understand the shallowness of attacks upon existing institutions and deceitful promises of undefined benefit by undefined changes?

"May we not hope that the great majority of voters will be able to distinguish between the substance of performance and the fustian of promise; that they may be able to see that those who would deliberately stir up discontent and create hostility toward those who are conducting legitimate business enterprises, and who represent the business progress of the country, are sowing dragons' teeth? Who are the people? They are not alone the unfortunate and the weak; they are the weak and the strong, the poor and the rich, and the many who are neither, the wage earner and the capitalist, the farmer and the professional man, the merchant and the manufacturer, the storekeeper and the clerk, the railroad manager and the employee—they all make up the people and they all contribute to the running of the Government, and they have not any of them given into the hands of anyone the mandate to speak for them as peculiarly the people's representative. Especially does not he represent them who, assuming that the people are only the discontented, would stir them up against the remainder of those whose Government alike this is. In other campaigns before this, the American people have been confused and misled and diverted from the truth and from a clear perception of their welfare by specious appeals to their prejudices and their misunderstanding, but the clarifying effect of a campaign of education, the pricking of the bubbles of demagogic promise which the discussions of a campaign made possible, have brought the people to a clear perception of their own interests and to a rejection of the injurious nostrums that, in the beginning of the campaign, it was then feared, they might embrace and adopt. So may we not expect in the issues which are now before us that the ballots cast in November shall show a prevailing majority in favor of sound progress, great prosperity upon a protective basis, and under true constitutional and representative rule by the people?"

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to insert in the RECORD a letter, which I heartily approve, and trust will be heeded by this House, in reference to pending legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE NATIONAL COUNCIL,
DAUGHTERS OF LIBERTY,
Philadelphia, Pa., July 29, 1912.

Hon. RICHARD W. AUSTIN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: From reports at hand it is apparent that the Dillingham bill for the restriction of immigration is to be sidetracked as a political exigency.

Let us quote from Mayor Gaynor, of New York:

"You have the hardest police situation in the world to deal with. We have in this city the largest foreign population of any city, and a large number of them are degenerates and criminals. The gambling of the city is almost all in their hands, not to mention other vices and crimes. The published names of everyone connected nearly or remotely with Rosenthal and his murder show them to be of the same class of lawless foreigners to which he belonged."

The Dillingham bill is the result of facts like the above and others equally alarming brought out by the report on immigration.

After being brought face to face with these conditions, whatever latent and slumbering American patriotism there is should be aroused to the manifest necessity of a restriction of such immigration as has been proven beyond any question of doubt undesirable and positively injurious to America, Americans, and American institutions.

Is it possible that the Representatives of the people are beyond any patriotic impulse except so far as political necessities require?

I can not believe that our fair land has no claim upon you that would deter you from rising and insisting, even at this late day, upon the passage of this bill as a matter of protection of every interest that may be termed American. Does this appeal to you as a call to duty?

Yours, respectfully,

W. V. EDKINS,
National Secretary.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Speaker, there was an Indian question which came up in my district, involving some important propositions, and an attorney made a brief of them and got together some very valuable information, consisting of probably 3,000 or 4,000 words. I ask unanimous consent to print that brief in the RECORD, so as to preserve it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the matter to which he refers. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I am provoked to say that I am profoundly grateful to the Members of this House for my success in having brought out from the Members' cloak rooms and their other quarters such an immense audience. Of course, it goes without saying, that when I am put down for a speech, even a speech of 20 minutes, we will get an immense audience, and it is a waste of breath and supererogation to say that the two distinguishing features of my speeches are enveloped in the fact that I have always a most attentive audience, and the least results from amendments offered, for not infrequently the Speaker is relieved from counting more than my own vote on my amendments and motions.

Now, I would not arise on this occasion except to discuss one question about the high cost of living, and it rages around the cost of meats. I will not relate in detail a circumstance that occurred a very short time ago, when I took upon my left arm the hand of a beautiful lady and led her to a reception. She was complaining about how much more than formerly her meat cost her when she went down to market. But if one fact has been developed more clearly than any other one thing, it is that the farmer—the producer—is not getting a greater price for his product than he is entitled to.

Now, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH] goes off into a discussion which is, I think, far afield and out of range of the subject, and has no application whatever to the subject of the high cost of living. The fact that somebody builds a railroad or a subway in New York has not, so far as I can see, any relationship in the world to the question of the high cost of living. All these people must be fed whether they are at work on these projects or not. What we have got to determine here is whether the producer is getting more money than he is entitled to for his product.

Now, it happens that I belong to four organizations—the National Wool Growers' Association, the National Stock Growers' Association, the Grangers' Association, and the Farmers' Union.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempre. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. LINDBERGH. I want to ask the gentleman a question. Does he consider that the competition is in the production or in the consumption, or in both?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I do not exactly understand the gentleman's question. It is very much involved. I would really like the gentleman to explain his inquiry.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Is it not a question of competition in consumption, just as much as it is in production, that determines the cost of living?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Oh, well, I want to say in answer to that that many, many years ago—more years ago than I would like to mention—I drove cattle from Missouri, swam them across the Missouri River and the Mississippi and the Illinois Rivers, and landed them in the slaughterhouse in Chicago just as fat as they were when we started, and we did not strike a railroad. That illustrates the fact that you are never going to get as cheap meat hereafter as you have had heretofore. Our ranges are being taken up. We have gone almost to the limit of our ranges. It so happened that I have been over to Germany once or twice. How it is that they live and produce their own meat more cheaply than we do here I do not know. Upon the declivities of their mountains they carry back the soil by burro power—carry it back from year to year—and produce their meats cheaper than we do over here. The time is coming in this country when we may have to do the same thing, but that time has not yet come.

Now, I would not have said as much upon this subject as I have but for the speech that was made the other day by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD], and I do hope and trust, for the sake of the Democratic Party, that that speech was not censored and approved of by our present nominee for the Presidency. What he means is that we should have free meats from all the world. And there are several gentlemen here, including my friend over there from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], who, strange to say, has a resolution in here asking for free meats from Mexico.

Several gentlemen from Massachusetts and all these men from the great cities, where the stomachs of the inhabitants are craving for cheaper meats, are now falling over each other to have free meats brought into this country, and they base their action upon the ground, Mr. Speaker, that the trusts of this country have got control of the meats, and therefore we should open the markets.

Now, I have not time to read it, but I will put in the RECORD some statements illuminating this question, and particularly applicable to the colloquy I had with the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD] the other day concerning the American Beef Trust and how that trust has obtained control of the Argentine supply. The American Beef Trust, of course, is now disorganized, and what "disorganization" means I think we will finally, in a year from now, understand, and we will understand that it does not mean anything. But the North American companies have got control of 52 per cent of the Argentine Republic meat supply, and I am going to put that statement in the RECORD. That shows that we are simply taking from one pocket of the trust and putting into the other.

Now, you are not doing that only. That is not the worst of it. It has now already developed that the Meat Trust in this country has got control of the meat product in the Argentine Republic. But, as I say, that is not the worst of it. Every Texas man here, and every man elsewhere from the West, knows that when we hand over to the foreigner the American market, either of meat, beef, mutton, sugar, or wool, we place ourselves, not maybe next year, but the year after that, absolutely in the power of the foreign producer. That is what I have always contended.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, and I think possibly my time is up—I think I ought to have been in the Senate. There is where I naturally belong. [Applause.]

Mr. AUSTIN. I would like to say to the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, that if we had the elective power in this House there would be no doubt but that the gentleman would be in the other branch.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I thank the gentleman, but I did not believe I would get a Republican vote for that place.

Mr. AUSTIN. I have just tendered the gentleman mine, although I do not know that it would do any good.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I thank the gentleman. I want to say that I have been kicked out of almost all the Democratic caucuses, but my vote in this House has been sustained by every Democrat in the Senate, and when the bills come back here even the House reversed its votes and joined me.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. How would the bull moose gang suit the gentleman?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Well, they sometimes vote all right.

Now, in reference to the sugar proposition, I am talking to this side of the House, because the Republicans are engaged in a purely perfunctory operation this afternoon in notifying Mr. Taft of his defeat at the next election.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Before the gentleman leaves the question of beef, will he tell us whether he has made a study—for I question whether the gentleman from New Jersey has—of the quantity of beef that is controlled by the packers of the country as against that quantity that goes into common use which is not controlled by the packers?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I have said I think it is 51 or 52 per cent.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then with reference to the speech of the gentleman from New Jersey, is it not a fact that if the meat which goes abroad, which may be sold at prices lower than those in the United States, is the beef which is sent by the packers, the maintenance of the price of meat in the United States at its present standard is of a decided advantage to the majority of the independent slaughterers of beef, including the butchers who serve the people?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I have an idea that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is right about that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In other words, if the American price is to be maintained, is it not maintained more in the interest of the independent and neighborhood slaughterers than it is in the interest of the packers?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Not answering the gentleman categorically, I want to say that I am a platform Democrat. I do not believe in revising the tariff in spots. I do not believe that this Congress will make anything before the American people by reducing the tariff 35 per cent, and leaving sugar, wool, and meat, and our mining products on the free list; because I want to say that the votes of one-third of the people of this country ought to be considered in this legislation. In my judgment the Democratic Party is very fortunate with the record it has made here in Congress, that there is a third candidate in the field; because, as I have said, I belong to those four organizations, and they will vote as one man for the fair treatment of the products of the American tiller of the soil. Of course you can take that for what it is worth. In my judgment the Democratic Party here to-day is most fortunate in the fact that there is a third candidate in the field.

As I have said, my votes have stood squarely with the Senate votes. I am going down the line upon those votes.

The day after to-morrow an assembly will be held in the city of Denver which will determine whether I shall come back here, or will at least determine whether I shall be nominated for Congress. I have no apologies to make. I think I have stood with the majority of my party. I have stood upon the platform. The platform of 1908 demanded a gradual reduction of the tariff. It did not mean a gradual reduction of the tariff by putting upon the free list the most important agricultural and other products of the West. [Applause.]

By unanimous consent, Mr. RUCKER of Colorado was given leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

APPENDIX.

MEAT PRODUCTION AND EXPORT.

PRESENT POSITION AND OUTLOOK.

From the international standpoint the most important and recent development in the meat industry of the Argentine Republic is the entrance and growing ascendancy of North American interests.

Chicago meat companies entered this field only seven years ago, but have already attained such a position that they are a decided, if not a dominating, influence in the progress of the trade and the control of prices. The extent of their interests is only partially known to the public either of Argentina or the United States, but they admittedly hold two of the seven companies engaged in the production and export of cold-storage meat and are believed to have at least a working understanding with several of the others. They have also secured land for the purpose, it is believed, of establishing new plants.

The two avowedly North American enterprises are the La Plata Cold Storage Co. and the La Blanca Co. The former, since coming under its present control, has risen from a state of insignificance to that of the largest single producer in the Argentine field.

A sensation was created by this company at the recent fat-stock show in Buenos Aires by the extraordinary prices paid in order to show breeders what it wanted and encourage them to develop a superior breed of animal. For 5 steers the company gave ₱11,500 (about $5,000) apiece, and for a total of 177 head gave ₱310,600 ($771 each in United States currency). It was estimated that the available beef on the 5 steers that brought top price cost the company about $5 a pound.

Taken together, the La Plata and the La Blanca companies last year produced a third of Argentina's total output of cold-storage beef and almost as large a proportion of the mutton and lamb. Their rapid expansion is indicated by the fact that jointly they have chartered all the space in 19 new steamships ordered by the Nelson Line for the River Plate fresh-meat trade.

NEW METHODS INTRODUCED.

But most important of all, perhaps, as showing the influence of the American companies in the Argentine is the fact that they are generally credited with having stimulated the industry through the introduction of progressive methods, particularly in the development of chilled beef. Chilled beef—the kind to which United States consumers are accustomed and regarded as superior to frozen beef—has been brought into commercial importance within the last year or more by the North American companies and seems destined to supersede in importance the frozen product. In 1909 the La Plata Cold Storage Co. produced more than twice as much chilled meat as any other company, and, together with the La Blanca Co., marketed more than 50 per cent of the entire output of that article.

The importance of the position of the Chicago companies in the Argentine is that, apparently, it puts the meat industry of the two principal producing countries in the same hands. Argentina is the largest exporter of beef in the world, and, next to New Zealand, the largest shipper of mutton. The Argentine now occupies the place formerly held by the United States as a purveyor of beef to Europe, the increase in the home consumption having cut down our exports in marked degree.

NO FRESH COMPETITION.

Argentina has been looked upon as a competitor of the United States in the beef industry, and has even been considered by some as a possible source of cheaper meat for this country. The present outlook there lends no color to such supposition. Shipments of beef from the River Plate to the United States may come shortly, but they will probably be directed by the same interests which supply the market here, not in opposition to them.

So far as the American packers are concerned, their present operations in the Argentine field have nothing to do with the meat supply of the United States. The immediate object is to obtain supplies, which can no longer be secured at home, for their English market. They have not given up their foreign business, as the diminishing export figures of the United States might lead one to suppose, but have simply transferred their base from the Mississippi Valley to the River Plate.

Argentina's export of frozen and chilled beef has grown up practically in the past 10 years, corresponding to the decline in shipments from the United States. Ten years ago Argentina shipped only 25,000 tons, as against 150,000 sent from this country. Five years later her exports of beef passed ours, and in 1909 they amounted to 210,657 tons, while those of the United States had fallen to 55,746 tons.

SHIPMENTS TO THIS COUNTRY NOT PROBABLE.

Even were it not for the position of the American packers in the Argentine field, there would be no likelihood that United States consumers could secure a meat supply from that quarter at less than prevailing rates, and probably not at such low figures. One reason for this is that Argentina has an ample market in Europe. For the year 1909 Great Britain took 98 per cent of the exports both of beef and mutton, but this represented only 65 per cent of Great Britain's total imports of beef and 27 per cent of her total imports of mutton.

It is apparent, therefore, that in Great Britain alone the market can be much extended. Moreover, it appears that the continental nations of Europe, which have heretofore used practically no cold-storage beef, are on the point of taking up that product on account of the scarcity of live animals and consequent rising prices. Hence, if the United States wants Argentine meat, it will be necessary to pay for it at European prices.

Added to this, as a further obstacle in the way of supplies from Argentina, is the fact that the cost of living in Argentina is high. This makes the production of beef high in spite of the country's great natural advantages for that industry.

ARGENTINE TRADE NOTES.

[From Consul General R. M. Bartleman, Buenos Aires; monetary figures in American currency.]

COLD-STORAGE PROFITS—COTTON GROWING.

The La Plata Cold-Storage Co. shows profits for the calendar year 1911 of $636,687.

VESSELS FOR THE MEAT TRADE.

The first of the five new steamers which are being built to the order of the British & Argentine Steam Navigation Co. for the carriage of chilled meat from Argentina to the United Kingdom has arrived in port. The five vessels are each 456 feet in length over all, 59 feet in breadth, and 38 feet in molded depth. They are the largest and fastest steamers yet designed and constructed wholly for the transportation of chilled and frozen meat. Each has an insulated capacity of about 400,000 cubic feet for either chilled or frozen meat and is capable of maintaining a service speed of 15 to 16 knots. In connection with the refrigerating installation there are nearly 50 miles of piping to each vessel, and each has accommodation for about 150,000 carcasses of mutton, or about 9,000,000 pounds of fresh meat.

QUIZZED ON BEEF TRUST—ARGENTINE CHAMBER ASKS AGRICULTURE MINISTER'S VIEW OF AMERICAN PACKERS.

[Special cable to the Washington Post.]

BUENOS AIRES, July 28.

The chamber to-day passed a motion inviting the minister of agriculture to state what he thinks about the interference of the American Beef Trust in the Argentine cattle market, what measures he contemplates in order to prevent the danger such interference may have for breeders and for the people at large by increasing the cost of meat, and to what extent such interference has already gone.

BENEFITED BY BEEF TRUST—STOCK BREEDERS IN ARGENTINA GETTING INCREASED PRICE FOR CATTLE.

[Special cable to the Washington Post.]

BUENOS AIRES, July 31.

There was a lively session of the chamber last night, when the minister of agriculture, Señor Mujica, answered an inquiry about the agitation among the farmers of the Province of Santa Fe. The minister declared the uneasiness of the farmers is not due exclusively to high land rent, but to many other circumstances, such as lack of credit.

The Government, therefore, will propose the foundation of a bank of agriculture. Señor Mujica also spoke about the American Beef Trust, and said its activity in Argentina up to the present has been beneficial to stock breeders, as is shown by the increase in the price of cattle.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, as a Republican I should like to bear testimony to the fidelity of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER]. He has not only been a constant attendant upon his public duties in this House, but at every opportunity he has stood for the interests of the people of Colorado on every question in which their interest was involved in legislation in this House. [Applause.] I am not only glad of an opportunity to state what is justly due him, but I think I reflect the sentiment of the Republican as well as the Democratic side of this House in the hope that the Democracy of Colorado will do itself proud and do justice to his splendid record by renominating him to a seat in this House. [Applause.]

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Speaker, the importance of the subject which I am about to discuss will be my excuse for taking the time of the House at this hour. I know of no economic question that so deeply concerns the great body of the people as that relating to the high cost of living. The President of the United States has referred to it in more than one of his recent messages to Congress; commissions have been appointed to investigate it; Senators and Representatives, governors of States, mayors of cities, and public bodies have discussed it from various angles, and yet there is no relief in sight. This year's prices of foodstuffs and other necessaries are higher than those of last year, and those of last year were much higher than the prices that obtained five years ago.

I have here two lists showing retail prices that prevailed in Philadelphia in 1896 and in 1911, covering beef, bacon, poultry, lard, butter, eggs, cheese, flour, beans, and apples. These lists show an increase of over 70 per cent in the 15 years.

The report of the Massachusetts commission on the cost of living published in 1910 gives figures showing expenditures for food of 253 normal families in that State. These figures indicate that in 1903 the average amount for food per family was $370.20, while in 1910 it was $478.10. The report also shows that rent has increased 12 per cent, fuel 15 per cent, and clothing 20 per cent in the same period.

So high an authority as Bradstreet's states that from 1896 to 1912 the increase in price of foodstuffs has been over 50 per cent.

According to a statement recently issued by the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor in New York City the cost of many essential table foods, when bought in small quantities, has gone up nearly 25 per cent in the last year. No doubt the increase has been almost as much in Philadelphia, Chicago, Boston, and other large centers of population. I quote from two sample grocery bills which the New York association has submitted:

	January, 1911.	January, 1912.
Bread	$0.08	$0.08
½ pound butter	.16	.20
¼ pound tea	.10	.10
½ pound coffee	.13	.15
2 pounds sugar	.12	.14
1 dozen eggs	.30	.40
1 can tomatoes	.09	.12
Potatoes	.10	.20
1 can corn	.10	.12
1 pound codfish	.10	.12
Oatmeal	.10	.10
1 pound beans	.06	.06
1 pound rice	.05	.05
1 cabbage	.05	.08
½ pound cheese	.04	.05
Flour	.13	.15
1 pound onions	.03	.05
Total	1.74	2.17

LETTERS FROM WORKINGMEN.

During the past six months I have received many letters touching on this subject from workingmen in the great industrial district of Kensington, Philadelphia, which I have the honor to represent. Here is one dated May 26, 1912, from a man whose weekly wage is $13.50:

I would esteem it a great favor if you will kindly send me any bulletins that are issued by the Department of Agriculture that will help to reduce the cost of living. I have a wife and four children to keep. You know that our State has laws making it necessary for a child to be 14 years old before it can go to work and be of any assistance to its parents. I will try to show you how much food and other necessaries a man can purchase whose wages is $13.50 per week.

This is our weekly list:

Rent ($13 per month)	$3.00
Coal (average)	1.00
Shoes (average)	1.00
Insurance (6 persons)	.60
Gas for lighting and cooking	.50
Flour, 2 bags, at 40 cents	.80
Sugar, 6 pounds, at 5½ cents	.33
Butter, 2 pounds, at 35 cents	.70
Potatoes, 7 quarter pecks, at 15 cents	1.05
Lard, 1 pound	.13
Milk, 7 pints, at 4 cents	.28
Eggs, 1 dozen	.28
Tea, one-fourth pound	.15
Coffee, 1 pound	.25
Soap, 3 cakes, at 5 cents	.15
Car fare to and from work, per week	.60
Total	10.82

These fixed expenses amount to $10.82 per week. You see there is left the sum of $2.68 per week, or 38⅔ cents per day for meats, vegetables, cereals, fish, medical attendance, medicine, and clothing. In addition to these things there must also be purchased, occasionally, household necessities, including cooking utensils, bed clothing, etc.

I do not wish to further impose on your time, but I sincerely hope that something will be done to help the working people. If children are not properly fed when young, how are they expected to make soldiers and sailors in case of war? There is no sense in spending millions for tuberculosis when the root of the evil is overlooked.

WAGES IN PENNSYLVANIA.

Now, let us see whether the rate of wages of the average workingman in Pennsylvania is $13.50 per week. The Bureau of Industrial Statistics of the Department of Internal Affairs of Pennsylvania, in its thirty-eighth annual report, issued in October, 1911, gives the following as the average wages paid to adult male workers in 10 leading industries of the State:

	Per week.
Boilers, tanks, and vats	$11.46
Boots and shoes	9.79
Carpets and rugs	10.61
Dyeing and finishing	11.15
Foundries	10.67
Hosiery	10.54
Leather (miscellaneous)	12.42
Oilcloth	11.71
White lead	11.94
Woolen goods	12.98

This list shows an average of $11.33 per week for adult male employees. Of course, skilled hands in all these lines receive somewhat more than the amount shown in this list, and unskilled hands receive correspondingly less; but skilled and unskilled have to live and so we must include both in our consideration of this great problem.

From the Pennsylvania statistics which I have quoted, it is plain that the average workingman with a family of, say, four children under the working age limit has an extremely hard struggle to make ends meet. And what of the man with a larger family or the one who is not steadily employed? Indeed, I fear there is a great deal of suffering that we never hear of.

CAUSES AND REMEDIES.

What, then, is the trouble and what the remedy? That something is wrong is admitted on all sides. Some would have us believe that our trouble is due not so much to the high cost of living as to the cost of high living; while others, who have evidently given the matter much thought, declare that the supply of gold, our standard of value, has increased so much in recent years that its purchasing power has gradually declined, and hence prices of commodities have steadily advanced. Undoubtedly there are some grounds for both these theories, but to the one I would say that high living, which involves expensive luxuries, is not much indulged in by the family whose income is $11.33 per week; and to the other, that if the increased gold supply has caused vital necessities to rise in price from 50 to 70 per cent in the past 15 years, it should have produced a corresponding advance in wages, the price of labor. [Applause.]

Owing to the beneficent results of the Erdman Act, which tends to settle by conciliation, mediation and arbitration differences between railroad companies and their employees, wages in that line have advanced more than the average in the past 15 years. Figures of the Interstate Commerce Commission show an increase of 25 per cent in railway wages in that time, while, according to Bradstreet's, the prices of foodstuffs have increased more than 50 per cent in the same period. Why this disparity? Some explanation of it may be found in the statement that while the settlement of the recent coal strike involves an increase of wages to the employees amounting to about $5,000,000 per year, the advance in the price of coal to the consumers will amount to some $15,000,000. Who gets the extra $10,000,000? Is it absorbed in the cost of high living, or is it lost in the depreciation of gold, our standard of value?

To my mind there are other and more direct causes than high living and depreciating gold. Our economic malady, it seems to me, is due in large measure to the money power, and the symptoms are manifesting themselves in monopolies, unequal distribution of wealth, and high cost of living. [Applause.]

MONOPOLIES.

The census of 1910 throws some light on land monopoly; how it has discouraged farming, is forcing some farmers into the cities, and driving others to the cheap land of western Canada. In 1900 the average price of unimproved farm land was $15.57 per acre, while in 1910 it was $32.49, an increase of 108 per cent. In those 10 years the acreage of improved land increased only 15 per cent, while the population of the whole country increased 21 per cent. In 1900 the rural population was almost 60 per cent of the whole, while in 1910 it was only 53.7 per cent. The great increase in price of farm lands is, therefore, not due to increase in rural population or, as some would have us believe, to increased profitableness in farming, but rather to the fact that land speculators have boosted prices, and men of small means who would have bought farms to work on, not to speculate with, have been unable to buy. While we had a large, fertile public domain open to settlers there was an outlet to the unemployed and a defense against monopoly. Now, with the public domain practically gone, the land monopolists have full swing.

Take the case of coal lands. One corporation owns 60,000 acres in the Connellsville region, which is the principal known deposit in the country of coking coal used in steel production. Would-be competitors must therefore get coking coal from that corporation at its terms. Does not this condition tend to make prices high? A former president of the corporation owning those coal lands testified that they were estimated to be worth $60,000 per acre. It would be interesting to know how those lands are assessed for taxation. If they are assessed at, say, $48,000 per acre, or 80 per cent of their value, as the poor man's house is assessed, all right; but if they are assessed at $60 per acre, or one-tenth of 1 per cent of their value, then the laborer, the mechanic, the farmer, the merchant, and the manufacturer are paying much more than their share of the taxes and the big corporation is paying much less than its share. Higher taxes mean lower net incomes to the parties that I have named.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. DONOHOE. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. In connection with the statistics of the coal lands which the gentleman presents I want to call his attention to the fact that the same corporation which holds 60,000 acres in the Connellsville coke region owns, all told, approximately 500,000 acres of coal lands in the United States.

Mr. DONOHOE. I understand that what the gentleman has stated is true.

Anthracite coal is selling in Philadelphia at $7 per ton. As recent as 1900, Thomas P. Fowler, president of the New York & Ontario Railroad and, by virtue of his position, a director in the Temple Iron Co., otherwise known as the Anthracite Coal Trust, declared, "If there were not some form of restriction, stove coal would be a drug in the market at $2 per ton." What is the restriction? Special privilege; the few who own or control the coal lands will not let the coal be mined unless and until the many are willing to pay the price.

UNEQUAL DISTRIBUTION OF WEALTH.

There surely must be something wrong with our economic system when a few men, less than a score, are in a position to control the money of the country, to extend or withhold credit, to make or destroy enterprises. I understand that the combined wealth of two of these men amounts to more than the assessed value of all the lands and buildings within the limits of Philadelphia, a city of more than a million and a half of people. I do not blame the possessors of those colossal fortunes, but I do find fault with the system under which such unequal distribution of the Nation's wealth is possible. It is not, it can not be, right.

A few years ago a man possessed of $100,000 was regarded as being in good circumstances. He was in a position to engage in business on a liberal scale, to give employment to a goodly number of persons, and to be a useful member of any community. To-day we have instances of individuals owning as much as several thousand such men. The thought suggests itself whether it would be better for us to have several thousand families in good circumstances, each useful to its particular community, or that the total wealth of all of them should be concentrated in a single family.

The salaries of the President and Vice President of the United States, the Cabinet officers, the Senators, and Members of this House, some 500 persons in all, amount to less than $6,000,000 per year. This is a large sum, and yet one individual draws two and a half times as much per year from one great trust.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania give us the name of the gentleman and also the name of the corporation?

Mr. DONOHOE. I feel that both are so well known that it is unnecessary to name them here.

Sixty years ago our per capita of wealth was $307; to-day it is about $1,300, an increase of over 300 per cent. But while our per capita of wealth has greatly increased the distribution of it has been most unequal. Sixty years ago we had few millionaires and few paupers; to-day we have, unfortunately, too many of both and both are still on the increase.

MONEY POWER.

Some would have us believe that brains and energy and thrift alone are responsible for those vast fortunes and that these qualities, combined with laudable ambition and enterprise, have produced the captains of industry and masters of finance who control our industrial system, our railroad system, and our banking system. While unwilling to accept this argument, I would say that if it be true, then we need some means of protecting ourselves from brain domination; for if it be necessary and advisable to have laws to protect society from strong-armed individuals who might use their strength to oppress the weak, our present condition of unequal distribution of wealth would warrant the enactment of laws to protect us from the strong-brained individuals as well. But if brains and energy are alone responsible for these great fortunes, if the possession of unfair advantages conferred by law have had nothing to do with their making, why do the representatives of the "interests" oppose so strenuously the abolition of special privilege? [Applause.]

OVERCAPITALIZATION.

Overcapitalization of corporations, a feature of big business, imposes additional burdens on the consuming public. The cost of railroad building and equipment in the United States is estimated at from $20,000 to $30,000 per mile. But the railroads are capitalized at $60,000, so that at least half of their capital, or, say, $9,000,000,000, has only franchise value or "water" back of it. It is apparent that if the capital stock of a railroad or other public utility company be inflated 100 per cent the people must pay higher rates to produce dividends on the increased capital. In line with this thought the following recent statement by B. F. Yoakum, chairman St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad, is significant:

Last year's agricultural products were worth $9,000,000,000 to the farmers. The Government used farm values in getting figures for this total. Assuming that the farmers kept one-third of the products for their own use, the consumers paid more than $13,000,000,000 for what the producers received $6,000,000,000. The cost of getting the year's products from producers to consumers amounted to the enormous sum of $7,000,000,000. The real problem to deal with is not high cost of living; it is high cost of selling.

The "high cost of selling" to which Mr. Yoakum alludes can not be charged to the legitimate merchant who directly serves the consumer. The local store is a necessity, and when conducted on individual lines that tend not to monopoly renders a decided service to the community.

The high cost of selling is traceable and must be charged chiefly to monopolies and trusts, overcapitalization and cold storage.

COLD STORAGE.

Properly regulated, cold storage would be a blessing to the people. It is certainly an advantage to be able to preserve perishable foods from the time of their abundance to the time of their scarcity. It should not, however, be used as a means of creating artificial scarcity in vital necessaries at times when the warehouses are bursting with foodstuffs. Is there any good reason why butter, eggs, or poultry should be held in cold storage for 15 months, as has been done? There is but one reason, and it is not a good one—to compel the people to pay the high prices. Cold storage run in that way is rather a curse than a blessing. Not only does it mean high prices in the time of natural scarcity, but artificially high prices in time of natural abundance.

WARNINGS OF HISTORY.

If we would take warning from the history of earlier civilizations, we must put an end to special privilege, private monopoly, and all that tends to social inequality. Peerless Greece, great in war, glorious in literature, fell through lack of social harmony. Imperial Rome, unconquerable in the days of her material simplicity and moral soundness, decayed from within and tottered to her pitiable fall when, in the words of HENRY GEORGE, Jr., "public and private morality melted down to almost nothing in the furnace of passions awakened by the despoilment of the masses for the advantage of the few." [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The three hours agreed to for general debate have expired.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for one week from to-day, on account of sickness.

EXTENSION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I report House joint resolution 344, to continue the appropriation for half of the month of August, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration in the House, as in Committee of the Whole, of the joint resolution which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 344 (H. Rept. 1123).

Joint resolution to continue the provisions of a joint resolution approved July 1, 1912, entitled "Joint resolution extending appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government under certain contingencies."

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution extending appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government under certain contingencies," approved July 1, 1912, be, and the same are, extended and continued in full force and effect for and during the first half of the month of August, 1912.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 344. Joint resolution to continue the provisions of a joint resolution approved July 1, 1912, entitled "Joint resolution extending appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government under certain contingencies."

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 22195) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. BAILEY, and Mr. SIMMONS as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 21214) to extend the special excise tax now levied with respect to doing business by corporations to persons and to provide revenue for the Government by levying a special excise tax with respect to doing business by individuals and copartnerships, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BAILEY, Mr. SIMMONS, and Mr. LA FOLLETTE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 21213) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PENROSE, Mr. LODGE, Mr. BRISTOW, Mr. BAILEY, and Mr. SIMMONS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5309) to amend section 3 of the act of Congress approved May 14, 1880 (21 Stat. L., p. 140).

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 344. House joint resolution to continue the provisions of a joint resolution approved July 1, 1912, entitled "Joint resolution extending appropriations for the necessary operation of the Government under certain contingencies."

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 5309. An act to amend section 3 of the act of Congress approved May 14, 1880 (21 Stat. L., p. 140).

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 344. House joint resolution to continue the provisions of a joint resolution approved July 1, 1912, entitled "Joint resolution extending appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government under certain contingencies."

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 25069, the sundry civil appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 25069, the sundry civil appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I wish the gentleman from New York would ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill and to consider the Senate amendments in the House as in Committee of the Whole. I desire a separate vote on three amendments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Can we not dispose of the other amendments first?

Mr. MANN. I have no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take the bill from the Speaker's table and consider the Senate amendments in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill mentioned and consider the amendments in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if the last section of the bill has been passed?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Colorado has in mind the general deficiency bill. This is the sundry civil bill. The general deficiency bill has not yet been passed.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. When will it be taken up?

Mr. FITZGERALD. As soon as we can get a chance, but not this afternoon. I think the gentleman from Alabama wants to take up the tariff bill after this.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask a separate vote on amendments numbered 2, 116, and 183.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent that all the amendments except 2, 116, and 183 be disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to disagree to all the Senate amendments except Nos. 2, 116, and 183. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the Clerk to report the Senate amendment No. 2.

The Clerk read as follows:

(2) To enable the President to secure information to assist him in the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by section 2 of the act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, and the officers of the Government in administering the customs laws, including such investigations of the cost of production of commodities, covering cost of material, fabrication, and every other element of such cost of production, as are authorized by said act, or any existing law, and including the employment of such persons as may be required for those purposes; and to enable him to do any and all things in connection therewith authorized by law, $225,000. Such officers shall report annually to Congress.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House disagree to the Senate amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment No. 2.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois that the House concur in the Senate amendment No. 2.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 109, nays 145, answered "present" 4, not voting 131, as follows:

Ending August 28:

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina with Mr. MADDEN.

Ending August 1:

Mr. Cox of Ohio with Mr. ANTHONY.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The next is amendment numbered 116, page 102.

The SPEAKER. What motion does the gentleman wish to make?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that amendment numbered 116 be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment 116, page 91, after line 25, insert the following:

"(116) PENSION BUREAU.

"Three hundred thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to employ, temporarily, extra clerks by the Commissioner of Pensions to aid him in the work incident to the adjudication of pension claims filed under the act entitled 'An act granting a service pension to certain defined veterans of the Civil War and the War with Mexico,' approved May 11, 1912, at salaries not to exceed $1,200 each; and in order to facilitate said work the Commissioner of Pensions is authorized to employ clerks heretofore employed in other departments of the Government service, or others who may be sufficiently skilled to do the required work, without complying with the requirements of the civil-service laws: Provided, however, That none of said extra clerks shall continue in the service beyond the fiscal year of this appropriation without further legislation, or by reason of said employment alone be eligible for transfer to the service in other departments, or be continued longer than may be necessary to do the work hereby provided for."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House disagree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House disagree to Senate amendment numbered 116.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I think I am entitled to the floor, although the gentleman's motion is preferential.

Mr. MANN. We are under the five-minute rule.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. MANN. We are under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CANNON. We are under the five-minute rule, and I understand the gentleman is entitled to first recognition; but, Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to have unanimous consent of the House to proceed for 15 minutes to discuss the motion to concur. I think I shall not use so much time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I suggest the gentleman ask for 10 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I should prefer 15, although I think I shall not use so much time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I think we could agree upon a time for closing debate, and then we could divide the time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much time does the gentleman wish on that side?

Mr. MANN. Fifteen minutes, I think.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that debate on the amendment close in 30 minutes, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois and one half by myself.

Mr. MANN. That will give the gentleman from Illinois 15 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely; but yet gentlemen upon the Pensions Committee and others may desire to be heard upon this matter, and I would be glad to have 15 minutes myself.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think we can easily agree on a time.

Mr. CANNON. I will agree with the gentleman at the close of any remarks that he desires to make, but I desire to be allowed 15 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. All that is to be said can be said on this amendment in five minutes. I ask unanimous consent that debate on the amendment be limited to 30 minutes, 15 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois and 15 minutes by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent——

Mr. CANNON. Make it 40 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have another amendment to vote on yet.

Mr. CANNON. I think we have plenty of time; we have not done much in the House to-day—well, I will say, make it 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that debate on the amendment be closed at the end of 30 minutes, one half of that time——

Mr. CANNON. I want to say to the Members of the House——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let us get an agreement before we begin the debate.

Mr. CANNON. But in getting the agreement I want to say to Members of the House I apprehend I shall use the whole 15 minutes myself.

Mr. MANN. That is understood.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that debate on this amendment be concluded in 30 minutes, one-half to be controlled by him and one-half by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to 15 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from New York is first entitled to the floor.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this amendment of the Senate provides $300,000 for extra clerical services during the current fiscal year for the Pension Bureau. Its purpose is to enable the Commissioner of Pensions to obtain such additional clerical services as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of the general pension act approved on the 11th day of May, 1912. This law has been approved since the 11th of May, 1912. No request has come from the Pension Bureau for additional help——

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). No estimate has been submitted by the Commissioner of Pensions——

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to make a statement of a minute or two and then I will yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MURRAY). Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not just at present—and no one in this House has any information upon which they can intelligently act regarding this amendment. This amendment was not inserted in the Senate by a committee after investigation.

It was proposed by a Senator when the bill was under consideration and, as is usual in many cases, accepted rather than to provoke debate or controversy. I understand this money is not wanted by the Commissioner of Pensions. This provision is so framed that even if additional clerical service were required the clerks that could be employed under it would not be of the character that would be of any value, but would be of the character that would be imposed upon him in order to take care of needy political helpers throughout the United States.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Does the gentleman get his information direct from the Pension Bureau?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not say so.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. I came from the Pension Bureau, and the commissioner says he wants the help.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The commissioner probably told that to the gentleman from Ohio, understanding his attitude on these matters, but the commissioner has never hesitated to observe the law, and whenever he wanted help or money he has submitted an estimate in accordance with the law. My information comes from a source sufficiently reliable to satisfy me and to justify my statement that the services that could be employed under this item, as shrewdly and carefully prepared, is not the character of services that would be of any value whatever in the Pension Office. But this $300,000 would be very helpful—materially so—to the Republican Party in its distress at this time in providing for a number of persons who can not be provided for in any other way.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield for one moment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox]?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COX of Indiana. On last Saturday I was at the Pension Bureau, and was informed by the officers in charge that 450,000 claims had been filed, and they had adjudicated 25,000 of the new claims, and were able with the force that they then had to take care of a thousand claims a day from now on.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand that to be the fact. And, moreover, the Commissioner of Pensions has had 71 days——

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I decline to yield to the gentleman at present. The Commissioner of Pensions has had 71 days in which to submit an estimate or a request for any help that he would need, and he has not done so. Mr. Speaker, when the Sherwood pension bill was under consideration I made the statement to the House that if the House were to enact that bill it should be fair about it, and do so with the understanding that it would give to the Pension Office whatever additional assistance would be required. I made the statement that I would personally insist upon giving to the Pension Office any additional help that might be required by the enactment of that law. That bill did not become a law. A very different bill became a law. My statement was well known in the Pension Office, as it is in the other departments here in Washington, and no one with any responsibility, with any official standing, has requested that this appropriation be made. No one has suggested it. No one familiar with the conditions in the Pension Office has said that this additional help is necessary. I hope the House, in view of these circumstances, will not, in order simply to gratify a whim of gentlemen upon that side, or of others, vote $300,000 unnecessarily to provide help that is not needed. These pensions take effect from the date of the application, and I understand that they will be cleaned up so quickly that nobody will suffer inconvenience or any unusual delay beyond that suffered by any person ordinarily applying for a pension. Indeed, they will not be delayed nearly as much.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has eight minutes remaining, which he has reserved, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has 15 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I wish the Chair would notify me when I have consumed 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will do so.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of the new pension law there have been over 420,000 claims filed—a great number. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] says—and I do not know by what authority he speaks, but it may be true—that a thousand cases a day may be taken care of at the Pension Bureau.

Mr. COX of Indiana. My authority comes from the bureau itself.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. That is the gentleman's statement, and I have no doubt he thinks it is correct; but that means 420 working days, with 30 days' leave of absence, for this force in the Pension Office, even upon the gentleman's showing. If nothing else was done touching current business in the Pension Office, it would be substantially two years before these claims could be disposed of.

Now, in 1890, when the law was passed known as the disability pension act, the force was increased by 420 clerks. Since that time the force has been decreased—I am speaking of clerical employees now—to 767 in the Pension Bureau.

Now, I am speaking of facts, and I want to call the attention of the gentleman from New York to a very significant fact—that to-day the current work for the coming fiscal year, without any reference to these 420,000 new claims now pending under the new pension law lately passed, gives employment to 767 clerks, and the legislative appropriation bill carries that number. They are provided to do current work aside from the work that is to be done on these 420,000 new claims, with still other claims to be filed hereafter. Now, are you going to suffer the current work to be put aside in order that the claims under the law that was passed in May last may be taken up?

I am getting letters almost by the score every day from men who say, "I am old and incapacitated; we are dying at the rate of nearly 40,000 a year." I refer these letters, in part, until I find what the answer is to be, to the Commissioner of Pensions, and there comes back the statement that in this avalanche of claims they have got to be docketed and numbered, and they can not even give the number on the docket, and most of them have not been docketed and numbered. I send the answer to the aged and destitute old veteran of the War for the Union, and once in a while I get a letter in reply protesting very seriously.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. In a moment. Now, one of two things is absolutely certain. The Committee on Appropriations, over which the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] so ably presides, recommended appropriations on the legislative appropriation bill for 767 clerks, on the estimate submitted before the new pension bill was passed, and the gentleman says:

That is enough.

He says:

We have no estimate from the Commissioner of Pensions for additional force. We have not heard. No demand has been made. One thousand cases can be adjudicated in a day.

That would be two years, if you count out holidays and leaves of absence, even if no current work were done during that time.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman believe——

Mr. CANNON. In a moment. Now, then, gentlemen on both sides of this House voted for this new pension legislation. We on this side almost solidly voted for that legislation, and most of you on that side, under the leadership of that gallant soldier of the Civil War, Gen. SHERWOOD—all of you but about 70 or 80—voted for this legislation. Now, are you going to let from 40,000 to 80,000 of these veterans die annually before their claims are disposed of, because you say it will cost $300,000?

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I will yield just for a question.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Does not the gentleman's information agree with mine—the information that the gentleman has received from the Pension Bureau—to the effect that they require necessary help over there to adjudicate these claims?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I have not had any communication from the Pension Bureau. I do not need any. This new pension law is a dead letter if its execution and administration are unduly delayed. Anybody can see it. Even my friend, the chairman of the committee, can see it, when I call his attention again to it. Seven hundred and sixty-seven clerks are needed in the bureau to dispose of current work there, and would be needed if the bill had not been passed, and the gentleman does not propose to increase the number by one single clerk.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. I had not quite finished my question.

Mr. CANNON. All right. I have very little time.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. I just wanted to make this statement, that any Member of the House who votes against this amendment votes against his private pension bill in the Committee on Invalid Pensions, because they have a rule that they will not consider a claim by special act until the claim of the old soldier has been adjudicated at the Pension Bureau.

Mr. CANNON. That is correct. Now, does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] desire to ask me a question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes. I merely wanted to ask the gentleman if he believed that, with the present clerical force, they could adjudicate more than 1,000 claims a day in addition to the regular current work that they would otherwise do?

Mr. CANNON. No; they could not adjudicate 1,000 claims a day unless these 767 clerks turned aside from their current work and devoted their time entirely to the new claims. They would have to work constantly on these new claims, even according to the statement of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox], and neglect current business of the Bureau of Pensions. Oh, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] says there are no good clerks to employ; that there is no trained force. Why, this clerical force has been decreased, and there are many of the former clerks in the city and in the country. There are plenty of experts who will come in for the $1,200 a year. The gentleman from New York said that the Republican Party in its desperation must have these 300 people appointed at $1,200 a year or it will sink. In my judgment that was not worthy of the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that he has now used nine minutes of the time at his disposal.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask the Chair to notify me at the end of three minutes more.

Mr. Speaker, what a contention that was for the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to make. I am glad to see gentlemen present here from the State of Ohio and Indiana, especially the Member from the Muncie district [Mr. ADAIR]. I had many letters written by Indiana Democratic Members while I was Speaker of the House to their constituents sent to me, saying that the wicked Speaker would not let a pension bill be passed, and the Indiana democracy passed a platform that tore passion to tatters. I had no defense except now and then to answer a letter briefly, explaining the conditions, saying that I favored and would do all I could for liberal legislation.

A Democratic House came in. We have the present pension legislation. We Republicans voted for it. You Democrats voted for it, except 70 or 80 of you; and I want to say to you gentlemen, when you flap your wings and crow and say, "We passed this bill," unless you give these 300 clerks to adjudicate these claims you will have to reckon with the soldier population that you sought to deceive at my expense and whom you unjustly deceived while I was Speaker, because you will be saying, "Yes; we enacted the law," but now if you follow the lead of the gentleman from New York you will refuse to give the force to adjudicate the claims.

Now, I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. I will reserve the balance of my time, but will yield to the gentleman later if I have the time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman from Illinois is going to use the remainder of his time, I will ask him to use it now, as I have only one speech.

Mr. CANNON. It is my motion. I have the close.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think I have the close.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is a pro forma amendment in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman will state his amendment the Chair will pass upon the question whether or not it is in order.

Mr. BATHRICK. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that the amendment is out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that the amendment is not in order, and the Chair rules that the point is well taken.

Mr. BATHRICK. I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman from Illinois is not going to use his time, I will ask for a vote.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman only one speech to make in conclusion?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is all.

Mr. CANNON. How much time have I?

The SPEAKER. Four minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I yield four minutes to my colleague [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there are over 400,000 pension claims now pending under the new pension law, undisposed of in the Bureau of Pensions. The question is whether the House having added these 400,000 pension claims to the work of the Pension Bureau and having promised the old soldiers that they would give them this additional amount during the balance of their lives, will keep that promise sacred and permit the money to be paid or whether it is an Indian promise—only made to be taken back. [Applause.] You on that side of the House have laid great stress on the fact that a part of the Democrats voted for the Sherwood pension bill. That part who so valiantly and patriotically voted for the Sherwood pension bill are to-day on trial on this amendment, because unless this amendment is passed more than 80,000 of these old veterans will pass away before their claims can be adjudicated. Do you propose to feed them on promises or do you propose to give them money with which to buy food and clothing?

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. For a question.

Mr. ALLEN. Has the gentleman any information as to how long it would take one of the regular employees to instruct one of the proposed new employees in the examination and adjudication of these claims?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have talked with the Commissioner of Pensions, and, without attempting to quote him, I say that under the Sherwood bill, which is in part a service bill, it takes a great deal of time to search for and find the service of every applicant, and a new clerk in the Pension Office is as able to do that as one who has been there for years, because it is a new proposition. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is where the main work comes in. Every applicant must have his Army service scanned; there must be taken from the service any time which he has lost. The Pension Office is to-day overcrowded with that work, and we propose from the knowledge we have on our side to relieve the office without an estimate and without a demand; we put the extra work on the Pension Bureau, but we are prepared to give them the extra help. We are willing to say now to these old soldiers that "we promised you additional money in your old age and we will give you the money and not blank promises," as suggested by the gentleman from New York. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the interest of gentlemen on that side of the House in this matter is very amusing. The present Chief Executive returned to the city one night, stopping over between trips in his primary campaign, in order to sign the pension bill, in the hope that it might benefit him in the primaries. Apparently he has grown so cold that, although 71 days have passed since that eventful night, neither he nor anyone else in his administration has discovered the need for any additional help in the Pension Office. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from Illinois himself has special means of obtaining information from the Pension Office. A distinguished citizen of his is one of the deputy commissioners there, and it has been charged from time to time that he was not overburdened with work, and attempts have been made to abolish the place, but even he has sent no communication to the gentleman from Illinois calling attention to the fact that the Pension Office is sadly in need of the additional help.

We understand the anxiety of the gentleman from Illinois in this matter. There is a large soldiers' home in his district, and after eight years' service in the Speaker's chair, during which it was absolutely impossible, until the dying hours of his service, to pass a general pension bill, now when the Democrats have the House and have passed a bill he is trying to outdo himself to show that he is favorable to the old soldier. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There is a peculiar reason for anxiety on that side of the House for this amendment. Three hundred thousand dollars available now, just before the campaign opens, for the employment of "clerks heretofore employed in other departments of the Government service or others who may be sufficiently skilled to do the required work, without complying with the requirements of the civil service." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Oh, yes; the old soldier is what the appeal is made for, but the need of men to spend their time out on the hustings and at the polls on election day is what is desired to help perpetuate this administration in office.

If there be a need for these clerks, the Commissioner of Pensions can estimate for them. This session of Congress has been prolific of and notorious for the supplemental estimates that have been submitted, exceeding those of any other session in the history of our Government. And yet gentlemen would have us understand that in so important a matter as this no one in the administration was sufficiently alive to the situation to suggest the necessity for this help. Not even a Republican Senator made any such suggestion. The amendment was adopted in the Senate upon the motion of a Democrat.

Mr. Speaker, if there be need for additional clerks it is easy for the administration to make that fact known; it is easy to communicate that fact to Congress. This bill is to go to conference, and there will be ample time for the administration to furnish accurate information as to what will be needed, and there will be plenty of opportunities for the conferees to draft an amendment that will provide any additional help that may be needed.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I decline to yield. The clerks to do the work can then be selected and required to do their work here in Washington, and not out on the hustings in the next few months in the interest of some gentlemen. I ask this side of the House not to be misled by declarations of sympathy coming from that side of the House, not to be misled by protestations of interest for the old soldier, but to let this matter go to conference. Then, if gentlemen on that side of the House, not having been able to do so during the last 71 days, during the next 5 days or the next 10 days can get accurate information from official sources that these services are actually required, the House can very easily agree upon a provision that will give all of the help actually needed. Until that is done I hope that this amendment will not be agreed to and that the gentleman's motion will be voted down. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I desire to insert as part of my remarks two communications which show the impropriety of adopting the amendment, one from the president of the United States Civil Service Commission, the other from the president of the National Civil Service Reform League.

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., July 28, 1912.

Hon. JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

SIR: The commission has the honor to invite your attention to the provision contained in amendment No. 116, at pages 102 and 103 of the sundry civil bill (H. R. 25069), which passed the Senate, with amendments, on July 24, 1912, and is now before the House. The provision referred to is one making appropriation of $300,000 to employ extra clerks outside the civil-service law.

The proposed appropriation would permit the employment of 250 clerks at the maximum compensation stated during the entire year, or a much larger number for a shorter period. The proposal seems opposed to the declared policy of the House of Representatives and of the President to secure economy and to the provision in the legislative appropriation bill as it passed the House, that no original appointments should be made to fill vacancies during the present fiscal year.

No legislation permitting any considerable number of appointments without reference to the civil-service act and rules has been passed since the War with Spain. A large number of the clerks then appointed without examination were afterwards covered into the classified service through act of Congress, and the service has barely recovered from this unnecessary and, as the commission believes, ill-advised legislation. The commission has ample eligibles, and many of these eligibles are persons who have had clerical experience in the Census Office, Treasury, and other departments in which reductions of force have been and are being made. It would be an injustice to deprive these persons of proved capacity of opportunity for appointment. The provision will require the separation of the persons appointed without reference to the civil-service law at the end of the year, and the Bureau of Pensions will be unable to avail itself, in filling vacancies in the regular force, of the experience which they have acquired. If it should be found that extra clerks would still be needed, Congress would be importuned to authorize the permanent appointment of such additional clerks. It is within the power of the President to make exceptions and permit the employment of former Government clerks or others. There is therefore no necessity for exception by legislation.

If appointments are made without examination, they will inevitably be persons of inferior ability, the work will be unnecessarily prolonged, and the cost increased. Experience has shown that the majority of employees appointed on the basis of political favor are far below the average of persons of like grade appointed through competitive examinations. To exempt these persons from the civil-service law would be contrary to the party platforms just adopted by each of the great parties. If the additional employees can be appointed as needed from the ample registers of eligibles, better service will be secured than will otherwise be possible, the efficiency of the force will be greatly bettered, and the cost of the work correspondingly reduced.

The experience of the commission shows that little inconvenience is occasioned to the departments in supplying very large numbers of temporary employees in cases of emergency. It is a misconception that it requires red tape, delay, and circumlocution to set the machinery of the commission in motion. Any other way of securing eligibles involves many times the amount of time and labor that is required in choosing eligibles from the registers. Hundreds of appointments can be made from the registers in a few hours, and it only remains to send printed letters of appointment to the persons chosen.

By direction of the commission.

Very respectfully, JOHN C. BLACK, President.

NATIONAL CIVIL SERVICE REFORM LEAGUE,
New York, July 30, 1912.

Hon. JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On behalf of the National Civil Service Reform League I desire to submit an earnest protest against the amendment to the sundry civil bill (H. R. 25069) introduced in the Senate and providing for an appropriation of $300,000 to employ additional clerks in the Pension Bureau outside of the civil-service law. This is amendment No. 116, at pages 102 and 103 of the bill.

The argument was made in the Senate that the passage of the act granting a service pension would entail extra work upon the Pension Bureau requiring an additional clerical force. But I can find nowhere in the argument, as printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, any reasons stated why this additional force of clerks, at salaries not to exceed $1,200, should be appointed outside the civil-service law. The only excuse for such a provision would be inability on the part of the Civil Service Commission to supply an adequate force within a reasonable time, but we are informed by the commission that it has upon its registers a full complement of eligibles from whom selection could be made for these positions. In view of the lack of any necessity for going outside the lists to make these appointments this provision in the bill is a gross injustice to those who have taken the examinations and qualified for positions in accordance with the law and custom.

The force thus thrown open to political appointments would number 250 or more. Congress could continue their appointment by further legislation next year and Members of Congress would be importuned by the force so appointed to grant an extension of employment or transfer to the classified service. There is no precedent for such a widespread exception since the days of the Spanish War, when in the face of full lists of eligibles on the plea of exigency a large force was appointed without regard to the rules. Before the lapse of any considerable time it was shown that this force was distinctly inferior in capacity to the regular civil-service employees, yet by subsequent action they were covered into the classified service. This amendment inserted by the Senate can not and will not be otherwise regarded than an attempt to secure patronage at the expense of the merit system, and we desire to urge as strongly as possible that the House of Representatives should not assent to it.

Respectfully, yours, ELLIOT H. GOODWIN, Secretary.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to concur in Senate amendment 116.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 165, nays 88, answered "present" 3, not voting 133, as follows:

So the motion to concur was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. LEE of Georgia with Mr. MCCREARY.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland with Mr. PARRAN.

Mr. LAMB with Mr. HAUGEN.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the next amendment be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report amendment No. 183.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 115, line 6, strike out the figures "200,000" and insert "300,000" in lieu thereof.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the paragraph may be reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the entire paragraph may be reported. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 134 of the bill, line 17:

"Enforcement of antitrust laws: For the enforcement of antitrust laws, including not exceeding $10,000 for salaries of necessary employees at the seat of government, $300,000."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move that the House disagree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to concur and the gentleman from New York to disagree to the Senate amendment. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to concur in Senate amendment 183.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to say a word. In the years 1911 and 1912 a Republican Congress appropriated $200,000 for this purpose. The appropriation for the enforcement of the antitrust law originated in this House when proposed by a Democrat, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]. He proposed an appropriation of $250,000, and it was eventually agreed to appropriate half a million dollars. The appropriation was a continuing one until two years ago, when specific appropriations of $200,000 for each year were made. In the general deficiency bill, which was considered last week, the committee reported an item of $60,000 to supply deficiencies in this item and has evidenced a desire to place at the disposal of the Department of Justice all the money required properly to conduct this work. There are some matters connected with the expenditure of the money, however, which has made it necessary for Congress to keep a sharp watch upon it. In March, 1910, a very sharp controversy arose in the House as to the employment of Mr. Wade H. Ellis, of Ohio. It was announced that he had been separated from the service. On the 15th day of March, 1910, this discussion occurred in the House:

Mr. COX of Ohio. Will the gentleman state to this House now that it was not understood at the time that Mr. Ellis was to tender his resignation that he was to be attached to the Department of Justice in the prosecution of trust cases? Will the gentleman deny that to this House?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have no information of the details of the occurrence the gentleman mentions. I simply make the statement that Mr. Ellis is not in the employ of the Department of Justice or in any other Government department; that since the day he sent in his resignation he has not drawn a cent of salary, and will not draw any.

Mr. COX of Ohio. Has there been a pay day since so that he could draw his salary?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not know about that. I know that he has not drawn a salary and that he is not going to.

And yet in a statement submitted to the Committee on Appropriations by the Attorney General and asking for a deficiency for this appropriation this year it appears on the 14th day of December, 1911, Mr. Wade H. Ellis was paid $7,000 for services. The committee has recommended in the bill as it passed the House the money that it was believed the administration could beneficially expend in the proper conduct of the Government's work. It did not allow any to take care of political favorites or of lawyers whom it was necessary to place upon the pay roll in order to enable them to do political work for the administration. Unless the House desires to place $100,000 more at the disposal of this administration for the purpose of enabling it more successfully to conduct its campaign, it will not agree to the motion offered by the gentleman from Illinois. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the estimate made with the supplemental estimate coming from the Department of Justice formally transmitted calls for the service for the coming fiscal year, now the present fiscal year, $300,000, to enforce the antitrust law. The gentleman representing the Democratic Committee on Appropriations recommends $200,000. The deficiency bill, after a full hearing from the Attorney General, carries $60,000 deficiency for the late fiscal year, making $260,000 for the enforcement of the antitrust law for the year just passed. The estimates for this year, 1912-13, I say again, is $300,000. The House passed it for $200,000 and the Senate amends it by striking out $200,000 and inserting $300,000. The gentleman from New York says that this is an appropriation for the benefit of Republicans in the coming campaign. I deny it; and then he undertakes to muddy the water like the cuttlefish and swim away by saying that somebody said Wade H. Ellis some time or other got too large a fee. I am not discussing that question—I do not know; but I am discussing a live question. Ah, gentlemen, let us look into the facts. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], in 1904, when the Democrats were in the minority, made an appropriation, or it was made on his motion, of $500,000 to enforce this law. It was a continuing appropriation, the solid Democratic side voting for it, and we all voted for it upon our side.

Now, when there is an estimate for $300,000 for real service, it is cut to $200,000. There has been much talk upon that side about the acquirement of the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co. by the United States Steel Corporation some years ago. Oh, you have torn passion to tatters about it. Under this administration litigation is pending to dissolve the United States Steel Corporation. You have spent $40,000 in making an investigation, and there is about to be born a report from the committee on investigation. Whoop-la! [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have five minutes more.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. CANNON] may have five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Gentlemen, the enforcement of the law on the part of President Taft is, following his oath, not only commendable, but is to be commended. Under the prosecutions the Standard Oil Co. and the Tobacco Trust have been dissolved. There is a competition, resulting in an increase in the price of tobacco that is raised—a real competition is resulting. And under a vigorous enforcement of this law you propose to go upon the stump and want to enforce the antitrust law, and yet you withhold an increase of the appropriation of $100,000, asked for by the Attorney General and proposed by the Senate amendment, one of the best Attorneys General we have had in a generation. [Applause on the Republican side.] For one, gentlemen, in the enforcement of this righteous law that is being enforced I dare not vote against the proposition to concur in the Senate amendment. You may muddy the water; you may make an unfounded pretense that this appropriation is to be used in the coming elections, but you do not believe it, and there is nobody else who believes it. I want to say to you that if you withhold this appropriation you will impede the enforcement of the law, and will have to answer for it.

I think that is about all I can say in the short time allotted. I can not go into the details of various cases as to the enforcement of this law. But the country understands it. Do you want, pending the prosecution against the United States Steel Corporation to spend your $40,000 in investigation and then cut off $100,000 for the enforcement of the law? Do you want to pretend one thing, and, to use a very adequate word which a constituent of mine used, "protend" another? That seems to be the position of my honorable friend from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, I wish I had time to speak of the enforcement of the law by the present administration. The President has kept his oath—to see that the laws are enforced.

The Standard Oil Co. and the Tobacco Trust organization have been dissolved by the decree of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The National Packing Co., formed by the various meat-packing companies, is being dissolved on their own motion.

The International Harvester Co. proposed to dissolve its combination of many companies alleged to be in restraint of trade, but the Attorney General claimed it did not go far enough and has brought on behalf of the United States an action to dissolve that combination and the case is pending for trial.

Many other combinations believed to be in restraint of commerce among the States are being proceeded against; while many other alleged unlawful combinations, fearing the enforcement of the law, are preparing to dissolve and comply with the law.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to all this, many combinations possible in restraint of trade are not being formed, seeing that if formed they will be proceeded against for violating the antitrust law.

Sir, this administration has accomplished more in enforcing the antitrust law than was accomplished under all administrations since the enactment of the law in the year 1890.

In conclusion, I say if this House, dominated by you Democrats, refuses to appropriate the money necessary to enforce this law, whether intended or not, it is in the interest of the trusts in restraint of trade.

You may investigate and report upon your investigations, but you have no power to enforce the law, and all your investigations and reports are "but as the sounding brass and the tinkling cymbal" unless you appropriate the money to enforce the law by and through the decrees and judgments of the courts.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have just heard the remarkable statement that this House has spent $100,000 investigating the steel corporation. The gentleman missed it by over $60,000.

Mr. CANNON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. It was an oversight on my part and I will make the correction. I was thinking of the total amount that had been expended.

Mr. STANLEY. The amount, however, is not so material. It would have been well spent had the Government spent $200,000 instead of $39,000. It is more useless, it is more illogical, for the gentleman to attempt to separate the investigation conducted by the committee investigating the affairs of the United States Steel Corporation and the petition filed by the Government than it is to say we spent $100,000. The day that investigation was inaugurated the Commissioner of Corporations had, in black and white, given that corporation a clean bill of health. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Who was the Commissioner of Corporations?

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Herbert Knox Smith.

Mr. CANNON. What has become of him?

Mr. STANLEY. Why, he has gone off after the bull moose. [Applause and laughter.] And it is a blessed thing that he is after the bull moose and that the bull moose is not after him, for he is, like Joey Bagstock, devilishly sly. He would never catch Mr. Smith.

That does not do you any good.

While Mr. Smith was Commissioner of Corporations under the bull moose administration, this letter was written under Mr. Taft's administration. He was Commissioner of Corporations until a week or two ago.

I do not care which horn of the dilemma you take. I am not settling disputes between the bull moose and the bull elephant. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] They both look alike to me. [Renewed laughter and applause.] The fact is that the Commissioner of Corporations had written to the President of the United States, stating that the syndicate which gave both of these concerns their birth was friendly, and that they could not afford to oppose it. The fact is that when the Commissioner of Corporations wrote that letter he had, according to Judge Gary's statement, a box car full of documents and statements showing that it was a guilty concern, as Mr. Herbert Knox Smith, by the investigations of this committee, was afterwards forced to admit.

Why, if you will take the petitions filed by the Government, you will find not one scintilla of proof, not one offense charged, that was not unearthed by that committee. You will not find an exhibit contained in those petitions that was not brought to light by that committee.

More than that, the gentleman that is conducting that suit—an able lawyer, and I do not wish to detract anything from his credit—will not deny that the facts upon which he relies were all brought out by this committee. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

What credit does a Commonwealth's attorney deserve who sits knowingly and silently by and sees the law violated time out of mind, and then when the streets are full of the cry of guilt, when some man has made it so apparent that he becomes particeps criminis if he does not act, he then reluctantly does his duty? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Why, this administration, this Government, has no more right to claim that it voluntarily broke faith with its ancient ally——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STANLEY. This administration, I say, can no more claim with consistency that it sought and attempted voluntarily, in order to prevent the destruction of competition, in order to prevent the dominance of trusts, to drag the Steel Trust to justice than Becker and Waldo in New York can claim that they were trying to break up gambling in the city of New York. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Five years ago there was on file in your departments, in the Department of Justice and in the Bureau of Corporations of the Department of Commerce and Labor, the manifest, unquestioned, cumulative, overwhelming evidence that this corporation operated common carriers to the detriment of the public good, that it made railroad rates. Talk about rebates! Why, all the rebates that were ever received by Rockefeller, all the rebates of the Standard Oil, all the rebates of the Beef Trust, all the secret rates that were ever made or given can be piled into one huge mass and they will not equal the inordinate earnings that are made by the Steel Trust's roads in six months; and they knew it, and they suppressed the information concerning it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

They had on file before them evidence of contracts in restraint of trade, that punished obedience to law with heavier fines than we punish violations of the law, and they suppressed it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Steel Corporation, when it was prepared not to suppress competitors, but competition, over a domain extending from Ashland, Ky., to El Paso, Tex.; to throttle and destroy competition in a region whereon it never before maintained a foot of ground; when that monstrous conspiracy was hatching, they went overnight to the "man higher up" to know if they could get protection. The man to whom they went was Theodore Roosevelt, and they sent Frick and Gary to see him.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. I will.

Mr. CANNON. If one-half of what the gentleman has stated is true, is not that a stronger argument than I could make in favor of concurring in the Senate amendment? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. STANLEY. I think not. I see no use in paying a hundred thousand dollars more to enable your administration to lock the door after the horse is gone. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to concur.

Mr. MANN. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 99, nays 149, answered "present" 4, not voting 137, as follows:

So the motion to concur was not agreed to.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. PATTEN of New York with Mr. LAWRENCE.

Mr. CANTRILL with Mr. CURRY.

Mr. CARTER with Mr. AUSTIN.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey with Mr. FOCHT.

Mr. HELM with Mr. MATTHEWS.

Mr. CALLAWAY with Mr. VARE.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House ask for a conference with the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. SHERLEY, and Mr. CANNON.

SLAVERY IN PERU.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I report the following privileged resolution and ask to have it read and move its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 649 (H. Rept. 1124).

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the House of Representatives all information in the possession of his department concerning the alleged existence of slavery in Peru, and especially all information tending to show the truth or falsity of the following statement made in an editorial in the London Times of July 15, 1912: "The Bluebook shows that in an immense territory which Peru professes to govern the worst evils of the plantation slavery which our forefathers labored to suppress are at this moment equaled or surpassed. They are so horrible that they might seem incredible were their existence supported by less trustworthy evidence."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

DUTIES ON WOOL.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 22195, the bill reducing the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 22195) reducing the duties on wool and the manufactures of wool, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. SHACKLEFORD, and Mr. PAYNE.

DUTIES ON MANUFACTURES OF COTTON.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 25034, a bill to reduce the duties on the manufactures of cotton, and, pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who speak on the bill may have permission of the House to extend their remarks in the RECORD for five legislative days after the completion of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider House bill 25034, reducing the duties on manufactures of cotton, and, pending that, he asks that all gentlemen who speak on the bill may have five legislative days in which to extend remarks on the bill. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD was then agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. CURLEY in the chair.

Mr. CURLEY took the chair amid general applause.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 25034) to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 25034) to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] wishes to make a short statement, and I yield to him.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] referred to a colloquy had about two years ago between the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] and myself. The gentleman from New York questioned the accuracy of a statement I made that Mr. Wade H. Ellis was not at that time drawing any pay from the Government. I simply desire to refer to the letter by the Attorney General on that subject, in which the following sentence occurs:

Mr. LONGWORTH'S statements are entirely accurate.

This letter was written in response to a request from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to be informed as to the facts in the case, and contains a full account of Mr. Ellis's connection with the Department of Justice. It appears on page 8435 of the RECORD of June 21, 1912. I think, in justice to Mr. Ellis, that I ought to make this statement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, it is a late hour and I do not desire to detain the House for a long discussion of this bill at this time. I think it but just to myself and to the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee that I should place in the RECORD at least the statement of why we do not amend a bill that we passed in the House a year ago after the report that has been made by the Tariff Board. I have a statement here, and instead of taking up the time of the House in making a speech upon it at this time, I shall avail myself of the general leave to print and print it in the RECORD. It is as follows:

Mr. Chairman, as was done with the wool report of the Tariff Board, the Ways and Means Committee has made a careful analysis of the cotton report transmitted to Congress by the President in his message of March 26, 1912. This analysis was made, and the results are being presented to the House because the President based his veto of the cotton bill of last session largely on the ground that the Tariff Board had not reported, and since he so strongly called attention in his message of March 26, 1912, to the value of the cotton report. This is the only additional information on cotton that has become available since the President's veto of last year, and in view of these conditions the committee has thought it proper to ascertain the findings of the Tariff Board in regard to cotton manufactures and to secure all possible benefit therefrom. The result of the committee's analysis of this cotton report affords the committee no ground for changing the duties on manufactures of cotton fixed in the bill passed by the House August 3, 1911. This will appear from the following summarization of the analysis of the report made by the committee:

1. The document has been prepared upon a basis quite different from that employed in the wool report, as the cotton report contains less costs on foreign goods and places a much larger reliance on foreign prices as a basis of comparison.

2. Could the data as to prices employed by the board in making the comparisons between the United States and foreign countries be accepted, it must be concluded that cotton goods can be sold on quite as low a basis in the United States as abroad. The apparent exception to this, according to the board, is found in the case of hosiery and knit goods, and for these goods quite inadequate data are presented.

3. The comparative data presented by the board do not cover the complete cotton schedule, but relate only to yarn, cloth, hosiery and knit goods, and to the cloth-finishing processes. No comparative data are presented for many of the items contained in paragraphs 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16 of H. R. 25034. (See Appendix.) So imperfect and fragmentary are the few comparative data presented that no safe conclusions can be drawn therefrom with regard to fixing tariff rates. It is impracticable to check the alleged findings of the Tariff Board or the results reached from an analysis of its imperfect data against the rates presented in H. R. 25034.

4. The bill H. R. 12812, now H. R. 25034, was not framed with any protective purpose in mind, but with the view only to raising the maximum amount of revenue in keeping with a proper safeguarding of the consumers' interests.

5. So far as conclusions may be drawn from the Tariff Board's report, it shows that the excessive tariff duties are exerting a peculiarly harmful effect in maintaining a system of unnecessarily high prices to the consumer in the United States. The immediate remedy for this condition of affairs is the reduction of the rates which have rendered possible this system of extortion.

6. The board reaches the conclusions of the Democratic Members of Congress in 1909 and since with reference to the Payne-Aldrich revision of the cotton schedule.

CHARACTER OF REPORT.

In submitting the report to Congress, President Taft appears to have been of the opinion that the board's report supplied data necessary to serve as a basis for fixing new rates of duty on cotton manufactures. It has, however, been found that the document supplies information only with respect to paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 10, 11, 12, and 14 of the cotton schedule as numbered in the bill H. R. 25034. It fails to supply complete data covering the items in paragraphs 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 12, 13, 15, and 16. Thus the data are found quite imperfect for a complete study of the cotton schedule. But it may be stated by gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber that it is not necessary to have the facts as to every paragraph or grouping throughout a tariff schedule; that the necessary material is that which supplies information as to cost of the chief items in the schedule, and that when this has been furnished it is possible to infer the rates on items that have not been included. This is based on the ground that the difference in cost or in conditions of production and sale of goods are about the same in all classes of articles. A superficial warrant for this argument might be found if it were true that the reports of the board show throughout a uniform variation in costs; that is to say, that if it appears that on yarn, cloths, tapestries, and so forth, the difference were of about the same range and description. This, however, is not the case. The board show that there is a maximum difference of about 13 per cent in the cost of production of cotton yarns of specified numbers between this country and England. But it also shows that there is no difference between the two countries in the cost of producing certain of the coarser cotton cloths. On the other hand, it shows that knit goods are enormously higher in cost here than abroad, and it suggests that the rates of duty be fixed to correspond. Nothing is therefore clearer from the report of the board than that there is no uniformity in these costs or prices, as the case may be, between the two countries. If, therefore, data are supplied for each of the items in the tariff schedule, it may fairly be stated that he who would fix rates of duty on the basis of the board's report must be entirely at sea much of the time, inasmuch as he not only has not received the data required, but must be convinced from a reading of the report that on these items, concerning which no comparative figures of costs or prices are presented, he has no basis even of an inferential character for the fixing of the rates to be levied on the goods.

Let us be perfectly frank about this matter, therefore, and admit that even those who claim that the board's work affords a foundation for the establishment of tariff duties can not profess to revise the tariff in more than a very few paragraphs by the use of the data furnished in the board's report. When they have used the figures given in the report for the purpose of guiding them in the establishment of rates on a few of the items, they will still be as much as ever in the dark concerning the rates that must be fixed upon the other items concerning which nothing whatever has been said. The report is therefore imperfect, incomplete, even if it were true that the figures actually furnished could be accepted as an absolute guide in the establishment of duties.

USE OF REPORT BY COMMITTEE.

The Committee on Ways and Means is under the necessity of formulating a bill which shall establish rates upon each item, without exception, throughout the whole schedule. It can not establish rates upon a few items and then say "We have no information as to the remainder of this schedule, but we believe it might possibly be so and so"; it must attempt to arrange the rates of duty upon some general and self-consistent basis. It must seek to make this basis as fair throughout and to adjust its prices to one another as well and as equitably as conditions will permit. Suppose that the committee were to accept the report of the Tariff Board, with the information on a very few paragraphs, as being the absolute guide for the establishment of rates. How would it go to work to fix the other paragraphs of the tariff? It could not do so on the basis of its previously established information, because that points to an entirely different basis of duties. It could not arrive at the proper basis for the tariff rates on items which are not treated because it has no access to the Tariff Board's material, and the board itself has refused additional information whenever it has been asked to supply it. If, therefore, the basis that has been furnished it for the remodeling of the duties is absolutely out of the question because of its incompleteness, whatever may be thought of it from any other standpoint, it is clear that a revision of the tariff based upon this report would be impossible.

PRESENT RATES INTOLERABLE.

It is generally conceded that the rates of the present law are inequitable and intolerable. President Taft practically admits that in so many words. He says they are too high and should be cut down. Every other student of the cotton schedule recognizes the same fact. Every man who has had the slightest intimate knowledge of the trade admits that such is the case. The Ways and Means Committee was convinced of the situation after its investigation of last summer. It is now urged by the President of the United States who vetoed the cotton bill which was sent him, to prepare another cotton bill and to submit it for his signature. With such general agreement that the present rates are not what they should be, argument is very strong in favor of making a change. Evidently the Tariff Board's report has had an immediate effect upon the mind of the President, since it has convinced him that the time has come for altering the rates of duty, a fact which he has never before conceded. The Ways and Means Committee is therefore in the position of having offered a bill complete in its terms, based upon such careful investigation as it can give, and having on its side the fact that the present rates have been found to be intolerable and absurd, so that there is some reason to believe that the President who vetoed the schedule once might not do so were it offered to him again. On the other hand, the committee finds itself unable, even if it chose to do so, to fix rates upon a basis corresponding to what the board has suggested for the reasons already stated—the incompleteness of the work done by the board.

FORMER BILL INEVITABLE.

All of these facts make the reintroduction of the bill of last summer absolutely inevitable, from any serious or fair-minded standpoint. The committee then honestly believed that the rates fixed in the bill were the best they could get. It has had no information submitted to it since then that could be used as a foundation for establishing new rates. Taking the bill as a whole, the minds of the members of the committee are exactly in the same attitude as they were before reading this report. Called upon for the presentation of a new measure, there is nothing that they can do except to present once more the schedule of rates which, in their judgment, would constitute an improvement over existing conditions and which is justified by the investigation they have carried out.

There is the more reason for adopting this course of action since in the cotton report of the Tariff Board, as in its report on wool, there is nothing to show absolute rates of duty, and its remarks are so general, in this case as in the other, as to leave open a large field for conjecture and difference of opinion, even regarding the duties to be applied to those particular commodities upon which information has been more fully supplied. The reintroduction of the old bill is therefore not only the inevitable result but the course which answers to the dictates of reason and of the information possessed by the members of the committee at the present time. We believe that the bill passed by the House last summer and now again presented will be a great relief from the existing conditions, which have been so severely criticized, not only by the Tariff Board, but by every other investigator. We say to the country: You know from present conditions that they are unsatisfactory; you have been told by the present Tariff Board that existing methods can not safely continue, although the board have not indicated any substitute for them. Will you then try the measure which we have worked out with care, and which we believe to be of a nature to as fully as possible safeguard the interests of all those who are interested in cotton goods, either as producers, consumers, or traders?

AUTHORITY OF BOARD'S REPORT.

In all that I have said up to this point I have been speaking as if the authority of the board's report could not be questioned. I have assumed that the facts set forth in it were unmistakably accurate. But this assumption is an assumption only, and I do not believe it to be founded upon fact. An examination of the board's report has led me to believe that while the report is more complete than its predecessor on wool, it does not show any considerable gain in method of treatment. In many points it is less satisfactory than the wool report. Although President Taft has spoken at some length of the necessity of getting comparative costs of production on cotton cloth, this report does not afford them. It is a startling statement, but a true one, that the report itself does not contain a single cost actually obtained from foreign textile mills by agents of the board. The only actual cost afforded in the report is a collection of figures purporting to represent the cost of production in certain yarn mills in a small district in Lancashire. In offering these costs for seven or eight English yarn mills the board has acted in a way which is misleading and deceptive. Although it leaves upon the reader's mind the impression that the costs were obtained in these mills by the same method that was followed in the United States, this turns out not to have been the case. These costs, if they may be called such, were obtained by purchase from a third person.

The board has not been able to furnish the names of the mills; and about all that can be said, even when language has been restrained, is that the board has presented, as if they were actual data, figures which they obtained from a source unknown to the Ways and Means Committee and to the accuracy of which data the Tariff Board had no absolute or positive assurance. This, under any circumstances, would have been an unworthy act and, it should be added, a perfectly unnecessary one. There is no reason whatever why the source of the data should not have been stated in the report, in order that the reader might be left to judge of the authority with which the figures had been given. It is evident that those who have been urging the Tariff Board as a means of investigation would not take kindly to the belief that the board was accepting as facts material supplied to it by other persons, not in its employ and whose methods are not known, concerning mills whose operations differ a good deal among themselves, and whose names are not known to the board itself.

In this connection, I submit the following correspondence between the Ways and Means Committee and the Tariff Board:

APRIL 20, 1912.

Hon. HENRY C. EMERY,
Chairman the Tariff Board, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In examining the proof sheets of the report of your board on cotton manufactures, I find that the English figures for manufacturing costs of yarn were obtained from eight mills, but I fail to find the names and locations of these mills or any explanation of the method by which these English costs were computed. May I obtain from you in this connection the information covered by the following inquiries?

(1) Were the manufacturing cost figures of yarn obtained from the mills in any foreign country except the eight English mills referred to in the report?

(2) Were the manufacturing costs of yarn in the eight English mills taken directly from the books of the mills by agents of the Tariff Board; if not, how were they secured?

(3) Were the yarn cost figures secured on the same schedule form in English mills as from the mills of the United States?

(4) What method was employed in apportioning the cost among the different kinds and numbers of yarns examined in the English mills?

(5) From what source or sources were the 100 cotton-cloth samples submitted with the board's report obtained?

(6) From what source or sources were the cost figures which are associated with these cloth samples obtained?

These data will be of great assistance to the Ways and Means Committee in its examination of the board's cotton report, and I shall appreciate an early reply to this letter.

Yours, very truly,

——— ———.

THE TARIFF BOARD,
Washington, April 23, 1912.

Hon. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 20th instant, in which you refer to the omission of the names and locations of the English mills in the cotton report of the Tariff Board.

In reply I beg to state that the information was obtained with considerable difficulty, on the condition that the names of the mills and the sources of the information were to be treated in the strictest confidence. Hence the omission of the names of the mills in the report of the board. The location for all the mills is, however, indicated on page 415 of the report as being in Lancashire.

Answering your specific questions, I will say in reply:

1. In view of the limited time at the disposal of the board, it was impossible to obtain the cost of production in all foreign countries. As explained in the report, the board confined its efforts for that reason chiefly to England as the largest producer and the strongest competitor of the United States both in our own and in foreign markets. Owing to the extremely low wages prevailing in Japan, the latter has been reputed to be a country of exceptionally low costs and a dangerous potential competitor of the United States. For that reason the investigation was extended also to that country, the results of which are given on pages 519 to 531 of the report of the board.

2. The manufacturing costs of yarn in the English mills were taken directly from the books of the mills by sworn chartered accountants and checked by another set of sworn chartered accountants.

3. The cost figures secured by these chartered accountants for a complete year's operation were transferred to our schedule forms as used for American mills, except that productive and nonproductive labor, which are given separately for the American mills, were combined under one head, "labor," in the English mills.

4. The same method was employed in apportioning the costs among the different kinds and numbers of yarn manufactured in English mills as was followed in the case of American mills. The method is described in detail on pages 371–379 of the report of the board. The work of apportioning the costs was carried out at the office of the Tariff Board by the same members of the staff of the board who apportioned the costs for the American mills.

5. The 100 cotton-cloth samples submitted with the board's report were obtained by two of the board's agents, Mr. R. K. MacLea and Mr. W. A. Graham-Clark, as explained on page 534 of the report, by visiting a number of the largest and most important jobbing houses in the country, in New York, Chicago, and St. Louis, using the schedules reproduced on pages 535 and 536 of the board's report. As explained on pages 542 and 543, the 100 samples are typical of several thousand varieties of cotton cloth falling under the different classes described. In no case were the agents satisfied with the statement or figure given by any one jobber, always having them checked by other concerns which they visited, so as to make sure that the samples selected were thoroughly representative of the great bulk of cotton cloths handled by the distributing trade of the country.

6. The cost figures for the 100 samples were secured from the mills visited in connection with the general cost investigation. In the case of every mill investigated the entire costs incurred in the production of the mill and all of its products were noted. The costs of the cloths were worked out, as explained in the report of the board, independently of the mill's own figures for all of its cloths. Whenever a mill was found to manufacture a cloth of the identical construction as one or more of the samples secured from the trade sources, these costs were tabulated to form Table 212 of the report. This table therefore gives the costs of each of the 100 samples in every one of the mills which was found to manufacture cloths of that construction.

Very truly, yours,

H. C. EMERY, Chairman.

Even under direct inquiries of the Ways and Means Committee in regard to the method of securing the English costs, the chairman of the Tariff Board did not see fit to give the facts, which were, however, brought out in the recent hearings before the Appropriations Committee on the sundry civil appropriation bill. The record is as follows:

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to know whether in making such investigations you have purchased the results of investigations made by any individual rather than have an original made by the employees of the board?

Mr. EMERY. We have in one or two cases purchased reports of investigations, but made by other sources than our own, which were unpublished and therefore hitherto unavailable, but these investigations were not made for Government purposes.

* * * * * * *

Mr. SHERLEY. Will you indicate in your statement just how extensively information has been obtained that way?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir. The only instance of any importance was that referred to above, where we paid a small sum for a report on costs based on an investigation made by sworn accountants for industrial purposes and never submitted to the Government.

I do not think I overstep the limit of conservative expression when I say that the presentation of these data in the way I have indicated shows a gross breach of propriety and entirely ignores the responsibilities that rest upon the organization in its present investigation, besides showing a lack of sincerity toward the public. Consider carefully the fact that the board's report is theoretical and comparison of costs between the United States and foreign countries is impossible; that no costs are presented for any foreign country except one, Great Britain, and that in that country actual costs are presented only for one item of production, yarn, and that even the yarn costs are confined to a very few numbers. Add to this the fact that the costs which the board professes to offer on this point and which supposedly are the result of actual investigation were obtained from unknown sources and relate to mills whose names can not be furnished and you have the measure of uncertainty, not to say duplicity, of the board. This one fact alone should be sufficient to discredit the whole report.

QUESTION OF SAMPLES.

The board, however, has offered what by some are regarded as costs of sample fabrics that have been compiled for the purpose of making comparisons between the United States and England in regard to the manufacture of cloths. These costs on samples were obtained nominally by taking the samples to the different mills and getting the mill proprietors to estimate the cost of turning out the goods. Inasmuch as each of the samples was made, so it is claimed, in at least one of the mills which were investigated, it is supposed that information was obtained which would warrant a satisfactory checking of the estimated costs on items supplied by the other mills. There is nothing in this assumption, even if it were correct, that could in the remotest way warrant the belief that data had been obtained sufficient to furnish an index of the actual cost of the samples in question. The board's report shows very great divergencies in every item between different classes of mills. It furnishes no information whatever as to whether the mill which actually made the sample in a given case was one of the more efficient, less efficient, or ordinarily efficient establishments. If it was one of the first-named class and had therefore held a high competitive rank by reason of the efficiency of its production, the information obtained from other mills could not serve as a check upon the figures supplied by this mill in any sense of the word. If the mill itself was not an average mill, data concerning the operations of more or less efficient establishments could be of service only in reaching the average cost. They would, theoretically, have been of service in that connection if they had been obtained from mills that actually made the cloth sample and if they had been taken direct from the records of these mills. But neither of these conditions was established, and therefore they can under no circumstances be regarded as meeting the requirements of the case already laid down. They are in no sense a check upon the figures obtained from the mill which reported itself as actually making the cloth sample.

INADEQUATE FOREIGN INVESTIGATION.

In fact, the slightest scrutiny of the foreign investigation carried out by the board shows what a farce it all was. So far as can be learned, the board did not send agents abroad to get any information on cotton until the latter part of May, 1911. Yet these agents who were sent to Europe furnished no data that have been used in regard to the cotton-cloth paragraphs for any country except Great Britain, and even as to Great Britain their data have been limited in the way already described. The experts returned to the United States before the end of September, so that they were at work in Great Britain little more than three months. It could not be expected that wihin that length of time two men—for that is all the board sent to England—could make very extensive studies.

QUESTION OF DOMESTIC COST.

Reduced to its actual scope, the board's report is merely an analysis of the outlays of a certain number of mills in the United States which have been taken as representative and whose figures have been compiled to show the amount of outlay necessary for the production of specified classes of fabrics. Here again we have the same difficulty that was experienced in connection with the wool report—that of dividing the outlays of the mills between the different products turned out by these mills. It is worth while to note that the board adopts a different method in this case for distributing the cost from that which seems to have been adopted in the wool report for the distribution of the costs there. Which method shall be accepted as correct? It is evident that both can not be, and when one is accepted, the other is necessarily rejected. The cost analysis which the board presented for cotton-yarn mills is anything but convincing, and is admittedly different from the method which is employed by the mills themselves and described by the board as rough or approximate. Yet its own methods of distributing costs are exceedingly rough and can be considered approximate only when the methods of work adopted are understood and accepted. There is no real ground for believing that this method of distribution can be defended from the standpoint of cost accounting. Certainly the board submits nothing to warrant the belief that such a defense can be successfully offered. It is true, therefore, that, in the case of cotton, all the general facts tending to prevent the use of the cost method as a guide in the establishment of tariff rates, which were set forth in connection with the report on wool, hold as true of this report on cotton as they did of its predecessor.

QUESTION OF PRICES.

There is one feature of the report to which I think I ought to draw attention. We complained of the report on wool because it paid so little heed to the actual prices for woolen goods ruling at the time in the United States and foreign countries. The board has apparently attempted to meet this point by furnishing price figures showing quotations for cloth of various kinds in Great Britain and in this country. These quotations have been compiled through jobbers for the purpose of indicating the comparative rate at which the goods left the mill in the two countries which are being studied. It is interesting to observe that in every case where this plan is followed by the board the preponderating number of cloth samples show lower mill prices in the United States than in England. But that is not all. It would seem that the fabrics for which prices were thus obtained could not be exactly matched abroad. The prices furnished, therefore, are prices on two different classes of fabrics in Great Britain and the United States in at least a considerable proportion of the total number of samples. So far as the samples themselves differ, the estimates of cost relating to them must be considered as being correspondingly reduced in value. For purposes of close comparison of competitive conditions, they are, of course, worthless. Further, the fact already referred to that the estimates were obtained under very different conditions in the two countries would largely vitiate their validity under any circumstances.

To supplement what I have said, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say further that the bill that is now pending before the House is the identical bill that was passed by this House a year ago, passed by the Senate of the United States, and vetoed by the President. Under the Payne-Aldrich tariff act the imports upon this schedule amounted to $28,417,441. The estimated imports under the bill that is presented to the House will amount to $39,163,800. The revenue obtained under this schedule for 1910, the year that the Payne bill was passed, under the Payne bill, amounted to $13,673,801. The estimated revenue under this bill will amount to $10,599,000, or an estimated loss of revenue of a little more than $1,000,000. The average ad valorem rate under the Payne bill in 1910, the year it was passed, amounted to 48.12 per cent. The estimated ad valorem rate under this bill will amount to 27 per cent. The burden of taxes that will rest upon the American people from the passage of this bill will be in the neighborhood of one-half of what it is under the present law. There will be entailed on the Treasury a loss of only about $1,000,000, if our estimates are correct. I believe that the bill is conservative in its reduction, that it is safe, that it will not endanger any business interest that is involved in the manufacture of cotton goods; and yet I believe it will be a very great relief from the present burdens of taxation of the American people if it becomes a law. For that reason I shall favor its passage.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the gentleman proposes to go ahead with the consideration of this bill at 12 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is my expectation, if I can make an arrangement with gentlemen who have business before the House at that time. If not, we will take it up on Saturday.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CURLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 25034, to revise the cotton schedule, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, August 2, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 23113) to fix the standard barrel for fruits and vegetables, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1120), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. PEPPER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 19191) for the relief of Christian H. Hedges, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1121), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado: A bill (H. R. 26082) establishing the Lincoln memorial highway from Boston, Mass., to San Francisco, Cal.; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. FLOOD of Virginia: A bill (H. R. 26083) to establish agricultural-extension departments in connection with the agricultural colleges and high schools in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. LAFFERTY: A bill (H. R. 26084) to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to provide for determining the heirs of deceased Indians, for the disposition and sale of allotments of deceased Indians, for the leasing of allotments, and for other purposes," approved June 25, 1910; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts: A bill (H. R. 26085) to provide badges and ribbons for officers and men now or formerly of the Volunteer and Regular Army who participated in engagements or campaigns deemed worthy of such commemoration; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BROUSSARD: A bill (H. R. 26086) to confer jurisdiction in certain suits and proceedings to the Commerce Court; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. AYRES (by request): A bill (H. R. 26087) for the relief of William W. Case and Mattie E. Case; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. DICKINSON: A bill (H. R. 26088) granting a pension to Thompson P. McCluney; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FRENCH: A bill (H. R. 26089) granting a pension to George W. Smith, alias George Smith; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HILL: A bill (H. R. 26090) granting a pension to Lucy K. Simons; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HOWLAND: A bill (H. R. 26091) granting a pension to Emily A. Pinney; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. POST: A bill (H. R. 26092) granting an increase of pension to James W. Howell; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. REES: A bill (H. R. 26093) granting an increase of pension to James E. Gleason; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RUBEY: A bill (H. R. 26094) granting a pension to Sophie Stephan; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SPARKMAN: A bill (H. R. 26095) granting an increase of pension to Robert F. Prescott; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 26096) granting an increase of pension to Sarah J. Wood; to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Petition of Francis Tracy Tobin, of Philadelphia, Pa., relative to impeachment proceedings of Hon. Daniel Thew Wright, associate justice of the Supreme Court for the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. AYRES: Petition of the Inventors' Guild of New York City, favoring commission to investigate the subject of patents; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. DRAPER: Memorial of the Inventors' Guild of New York City, favoring appointment of a commission to consider the patent system of the United States; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. FORNES: Memorial of the Inventors' Guild of New York City, favoring commission to investigate the patent system of the United States; to the Committee on Patents.

Also, petition of the Postal Progress League of New York City, against passage of the Bourne parcel-post bill; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. FULLER: Petition of the General Roofing Manufacturing Co., of Marseilles, Ill., against the passage of the Bourne parcel-post bill; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. LINDSAY: Petition of De Cappet & Doremus, of New York City, favoring passage of bill to provide additional aids to navigation; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Also, memorial of the Inventors' Guild of New York City, favoring appointment of a commission to consider the patent system of the United States; to the Committee on Patents.

Also, petition of the National Liberal Immigration League, of New York City, favoring building two battleships; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. MONDELL: Petitions of citizens of Wyoming against passage of a parcel-post system; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. PARRAN: Memorial of Active Council, No. 617, and Southwark Council, No. 144, Order of Independent Americans, of Philadelphia, Pa., favoring passage of House bill 25309, requiring the flag of the United States to be displayed on all lighthouses of the United States and insular possessions; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of 43 citizens of the State of Maryland engaged in the printing and lithographing trades, against passage of the Bourne parcel-post bill; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. WILSON of New York: Petition of the National Liberal Immigration League, of New York City, favoring building two battleships; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, memorial of the Inventors' Guild of New York City, favoring appointment of a commission to consider the patent system of the United States; to the Committee on Patents.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, August 2, 1912.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

Mr. BACON took the chair as President pro tempore under the previous order of the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings when, on request of Mr. LODGE and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 344) to continue the provisions of a joint resolution approved July 1, 1912, entitled "Joint resolution extending appropriations for the necessary operation of the Government under certain contingencies," and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

MILL OPERATIVES AT LAWRENCE, MASS.

Mr. LODGE. I present a brief letter from the mayor of Lawrence, Mass., making a statement in regard to certain conditions of labor referred to by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CITY OF LAWRENCE, OFFICE OF THE MAYOR,
Lawrence, Mass., July 26, 1912.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE DEAR SIR: I desire to call your attention to a statement made by Senator POINDEXTER a day or two since in regard to labor in the city of Lawrence. He stated that black labor from the Cape Verde Islands was being dumped into Lawrence to replace the Irish and French-Canadian mill operatives.

As a matter of fact there are less than 50 Portuguese negroes employed in any of the mills in Lawrence to-day. It is common knowledge that Cape Verde Islanders do not perform inside labor, except in rare instances, but are acclimated by their own temperature to perform extremely hard outdoor labor, especially on construction work. It is admitted that there are a score or more Cape Verde Islanders employed on mill construction in Lawrence, but they are doing the hardest kind of outdoor labor, which the class of Irish and French-Canadians that live in Lawrence are not compelled to do, and when Senator POINDEXTER says that negroes are replacing Irish and French-Canadian mill operatives in Lawrence he is greatly mistaken.

It would please the people of Lawrence and the city government very much, Senator LODGE, if this letter could be read in the Senate and given as much publicity as the statements made by Senator POINDEXTER.

Thanking you again, I am, sir,

Very gratefully, yours, MICHAEL A. SCANLON,
Mayor of Lawrence.

PETITIONS.

Mr. GALLINGER presented petitions of sundry citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for the enactment of legislation to maintain the present water rates in the District, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. KERN presented the petition of Henry M. Williams, of Fort Wayne, Ind., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting a second consecutive presidential term, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DU PONT. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 25531) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 1006) thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 7378) for the relief of James E. C. Covel, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 1007) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5763) for the relief of William K. Harvey, alias William K. Hall, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1008) thereon.

SEWER PIPE AT NEW BEDFORD, MASS.

Mr. DU PONT. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 15509) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a sewer pipe upon and across Fort Rodman Military Reservation at New Bedford, Mass.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the present consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from Delaware.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SHIVELY. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, if desired.

Mr. LODGE. I can explain the bill in a moment. It is simply granting permission to the city of New Bedford to allow a sewer pipe through the grounds of Fort Rodman. It costs the Government nothing and is merely the necessary permission to allow them to lay a pipe, which is the city pipe.

Mr. DU PONT. I will state to the Senator from Indiana that the bill has been carefully considered by the Committee on Military Affairs, and the rights of the Government are fully protected.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MARTIN of Virginia:

A bill (S. 7409) to constitute a commission to investigate the purchase of American-grown tobacco by the governments of foreign countries; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

A bill (S. 7410) to authorize the Carolina, Clinchfield & Ohio Railway to construct bridges across the Big Sandy River and the branches thereof, in the States of Virginia and Kentucky; and

A bill (S. 7411) to authorize the Clinchfield Northern Railway, of Kentucky, to construct bridges across the Big Sandy River and the branches thereof, in the States of Kentucky and Virginia; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 7412) granting an increase of pension to Edward P. Morgan (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KERN:

A bill (S. 7413) granting an increase of pension to William H. Moore (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. REED:

A bill (S. 7414) granting an increase of pension to Louisa B. Highley; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CATRON:

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House insists upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 22195) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. SHACKLEFORD, and Mr. PAYNE managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate numbered 116 to the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, disagrees to the residue amendments of the Senate to the bill, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. SHERLEY, and Mr. CANNON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 5309) to amend section 3 of the act of Congress approved May 14, 1880 (21 Stat. L., p. 140), and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives agreeing to the amendment of the Senate numbered 116 and disagreeing to the residue amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments still in disagreement and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. CULBERSON conferees on the part of the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the following joint resolution:

S. J. Res. 127. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to supply tents and rations to American citizens compelled to leave Mexico.

FOREIGN OCCUPATIONS ON AMERICAN CONTINENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a resolution coming over from a former day which is now in order. It will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 371, submitted by Mr. LODGE on the 31st ultimo, as follows:

Resolved, That when any harbor or other place in the American continents is so situated that the occupation thereof for naval or military purposes might threaten the communications or the safety of the United States, the Government of the United States could not see without grave concern the possession of such harbor or other place by any corporation or association which has such a relation to another Government, not American, as to give that Government practical power of control for national purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not rise to object to the passage of the resolution, but I should like to hear from the Senator from Massachusetts a statement with regard to the real meaning of the resolution as it affects what we ordinarily know as the Monroe doctrine. Is it an extension of that doctrine as it has been generally interpreted or is it a mere application of the doctrine? I believe both the country and the Senate would like to hear a word from the author of the resolution in order that we may fully understand just what we are doing and just what notice we are giving to the world.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the declaration embodied in the resolution rests on a much broader and, if I may say, older ground than the Monroe doctrine. It rests on the ground which all nations have recognized and maintained of their right to oppose the founding by a foreign Government or by persons under foreign control of establishments at points which would threaten the safety or the communications of the Government itself.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Massachusetts will pardon me, while he is making this explanation there ought to be a quorum of the Senate present. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri suggests that there is no quorum present. The Secretary will proceed to call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Shively
Bacon	du Pont	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Bailey	Fall	Massey	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Gallinger	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Bourne	Gronna	Nelson	Smoot
Brandegee	Heyburn	Overman	Stone
Bristow	Hitchcock	Page	Sutherland
Burnham	Johnson, Me.	Penrose	Swanson
Burton	Johnston, Ala.	Percy	Thornton
Clark, Wyo.	Jones	Perkins	Tillman
Crane	Kenyon	Poindexter	Warren
Crawford	Kern	Pomerene	Wetmore
Cullom	Lodge	Reed	Williams
Cummins	McCumber	Root	Works

Mr. THORNTON. I announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. FOSTER]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] is detained from the Senate to-day on official business.

Mr. BOURNE. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is detained because of official duty. He has a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] is unavoidably detained on public business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll of the Senate 56 Senators have answered to their names, and a quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I may repeat what I began to say, this resolution rests on a generally accepted principle of the law of nations, older than the Monroe doctrine. It rests on the principle that every nation has a right to protect its own safety, and that if it feels that the possession by a foreign power, for military or naval purposes, of any given harbor or place is prejudicial to its safety, it is its duty as well as its right to interfere.

I will instance as an example of what I mean the protest that was made successfully against the occupation of the port of Agadir, in Morocco, by Germany. England objected on the ground that it threatened her communication through the Mediterranean. That view was shared largely by the European powers, and the occupation of that port was prevented in that way. That is the principle upon which the resolution rests.

It has been made necessary by a change of modern conditions, under which, while a Government takes no action itself, the possession of an important place of the character I have described may be taken by a corporation or association which would be under the control of the foreign Government.

The Monroe doctrine was, of course, an extension in our own interests of this underlying principle—the right of every nation to provide for its own safety. The Monroe doctrine, as we all know, was applied, so far as the taking possession of territory was concerned, to its being open to further colonization, and naturally did not touch upon the precise point involved here. But without any Monroe doctrine the possession of a harbor such as that of Magdalena Bay, which has led to this resolution, would render it necessary, I think, to make some declaration covering a case where a corporation or association was involved.

In this particular case it became apparent from the inquiries made by the committee and by the administration that no Government was concerned in taking possession of Magdalena Bay; but it also became apparent that those persons who held control of the Mexican concession, which included the land about Magdalena Bay, were engaged in negotiations, which have not yet been completed certainly but which have only been tentative, looking to the sale of that bay and the land about it to a corporation either created or authorized by a foreign Government, or in which the stock was largely held or controlled by foreigners.

The passage of this resolution has seemed to the committee, without division, I think, to be in the interest of peace. It is always desirable to make the position of a country in regard to a question of this kind known beforehand, and not to allow a situation to arise in which it might be necessary to urge a friendly power to withdraw when that withdrawal could not be made, perhaps, without some humiliation.

The resolution is merely a statement of policy, allied to the Monroe doctrine, of course, but not necessarily dependent upon it or growing out of it. When the message came in I made a statement as to the conditions at Magdalena Bay which had led to the resolution of inquiry and which has now led to the subsequent action of the committee. It seemed to the committee that it was very wise to make this statement of policy at this time, when it can give offense to no one and makes the position of the United States clear.

Of course I need not say to the Senate that the opening of the Panama Canal gives to the question of Magdalena Bay and to that of the Galapagos Islands, which have been once or twice before considered, an importance such as they have never possessed, and I think it eminently desirable in every interest that this resolution should receive the assent of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think every nation recognizes and accepts the principle just announced by the Senator from Massachusetts as being the foundation for the resolution which is before us. The part of it which seems obscure to me is the attempt to create some relation between a private corporation or association of individuals and a foreign nation. I do not understand precisely what that relation must be in order that it shall fall within the scope of the resolution. Suppose, for instance, that a corporation were created to take some land in Mexico or in some other part of the world, and the corporation had for its stockholders only the citizens of a foreign country—of Great Britain, of Japan, of France, or any other foreign country—would that fact alone bring the transaction within the meaning of this resolution?

I would be the last to object to any announcement of our intention to preserve our own integrity, but I should like to know more about the relation which such a corporation must sustain to a foreign country in order to bring it within the scope of the resolution than is contained in the resolution itself.

It seems to me that we are rather vague and uncertain with regard to that phase of the matter. I do not believe it is wise for the United States to say that the stock of the company which owns the concession in or around Magdalena Bay should not become the property of the citizens of some other country without an additional specification as to the relation of those stockholders to their government. The mere fact of ownership ought not, as it seems to me, to be declared to be against the public policy of the United States.

It is true that the resolution says that this must occur under circumstances that indicate control over the corporation or the association so owning the land or water, as the case may be, but all that seems to be so expressed that almost any interpretation can be put upon it. While I do not intend to discuss the matter at length, I could not forbear expressing my opinion that this departure from any doctrine which I have ever heard announced should be so phrased that there could be no doubt whatsoever about it, lest we at some future time, having taken ground that we can not defend, may be compelled to recede from it to our own chagrin and humiliation.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I do not rise to make any special opposition to the passage of this resolution, but I do think we ought to have some fuller information respecting it before we act upon it.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. ROOT. It appears to me that the proper consideration of this resolution calls for the application of the thirty-fifth rule of the Senate. I therefore move that the doors of the Senate be closed for the discussion of this matter, because, in my opinion, it requires secrecy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there a second to the motion of the Senator from New York?

Mr. GALLINGER. I second the motion, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this question behind closed doors, and the Senator from New Hampshire seconds the motion. Under the rule the galleries will be cleared and the doors will be closed.

Thereupon (at 11 o'clock and 33 minutes a. m.) the doors were closed, and the Senate, with closed doors, proceeded to consider the resolution, which was amended, on the motion of Mr. LODGE, by striking out the word "national" in the last line, before the word "purposes," and inserting "naval or military."

The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the President pro tempore laid before the Senate the unfinished business, the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone, when, on request of Mr. BRANDEGEE and by unanimous consent, the unfinished business was temporarily laid aside.

At 2 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m. the doors were reopened.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

The SECRETARY. In line 6, before the word "possession," insert "actual or potential," and in line 7, after the word "any," strike out "corporation or association which has such a relation to another," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That when any harbor or other place in the American continents is so situated that the occupation thereof for naval or military purposes might threaten the communications or the safety of the United States, the Government of the United States could not see, without grave concern, the actual or potential possession of such harbor or other place by any Government, not American, as to give that Government practical power of control for naval or military purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just stated.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON], but I understand I have a right to vote in this case. I vote "yea."

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. He does not seem to be in the Chamber. I therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER]. I transfer the pair to the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. DU PONT (when Mr. RICHARDSON'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] is absent from the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Georgia was called). The junior Senator from Georgia is detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. SMOOT (when Mr. STEPHENSON'S name was called). The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] has a general pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. If the Senator from Wisconsin were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] and therefore withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia (when Mr. WATSON'S name was called). The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WATSON] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS]. If present, and able to vote, the Senator from West Virginia would vote "yea."

Mr. WETMORE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] and therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

I desire to add that my colleague [Mr. LIPPITT] is unavoidably absent, and is paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], and if present would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], with whom I am paired, was upon the subcommittee which reported this resolution, and in addition to that I am informed that if he were present, he would vote "yea." I therefore feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SHIVELY. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. KERN] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber.

I desire to say further that the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] is paired with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. WILLIAMS (after having voted in the negative). I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] did not vote. Is that true?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania has not voted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I must withdraw my vote, as I have a pair with him. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I transfer it to the Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BOURNE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is absent from the Chamber necessarily on public business, and that he is paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OVERMAN. My colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is absent on important public business. He is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

Mr. HEYBURN (after having voted in the affirmative). I would inquire whether the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed he has not.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have a pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], but I understand from his colleague [Mr. JOHNSTON] that if he were present he would vote "yea." So I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. JONES. My colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber. If he were present, I am satisfied he would vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE. I desire to announce the pair of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

The result was announced—yeas 51, nays 4, as follows:

YEAS—51.

Ashurst	Cullom	McLean	Shively
Bacon	Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.
Bourne	Fall	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Md.

So Mr. LODGE's resolution as amended was agreed to.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BOURNE. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate resume the consideration of House bill 21279, the Post Office appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks that the Senate resume the consideration of House bill H. R. 21279, known as the Post Office appropriation bill. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator yield to me to introduce a joint resolution?

Mr. BOURNE. With pleasure.

RELIEF OF AMERICAN CITIZENS AT EL PASO, TEX.

Mr. BAILEY. I introduce a joint resolution, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 129) to provide transportation for American citizens fleeing from threatened danger in the Republic of Mexico was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to furnish transportation from El Paso, Tex., to such place in the United States as each shall elect, those American citizens fleeing from the Republic of Mexico who are now or who may hereafter be temporarily supplied with shelter and sustenance, in whole or in part, by the Government of the United States in or near El Paso, Tex.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this joint resolution the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, upon vouchers to be approved by the commander of the United States forces at Fort Bliss, Tex.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, we have just passed a resolution relating especially to Magdalena Bay, although general in its terms, that seems to me to be meaningless. We seem to be very greatly alarmed at the prospect of foreign citizens, Europeans or Asiatics, becoming interested in holdings in Latin-American countries. I do not think the resolution will have any practical effect as a declaration of national or international policy. I think it will have the effect of aiding some people who are seeking to acquire holdings about Magdalena Bay by terminating negotiations now pending for the disposition of these holdings to other people, and thereby affording an opportunity to those who are seeking it to acquire this possession at a lower price or, at least, without the competition of those who are now negotiating for it.

We seem to be very much concerned all of a sudden about a danger that is not, in fact, a danger; something up in the air; some remote possibility. At the same time, Senators have not been so careful of the rights of American citizens themselves in South America or in Mexico. Here we have before us an example. I have to-day received a telegraphic request or invitation, as other Senators have, to visit the city of El Paso to see and interview 2,500 or 3,000 American citizens who have been driven from Mexico in destitution. They have been compelled to abandon their homes and possessions, and we are now about to pass a joint resolution to take money out of the Public Treasury—and that joint resolution I shall vote for—to send these wretched people to some place. I do not know whether they have homes to go to, but to send them to some place of refuge at the public expense.

I can not forbear at this juncture from drawing a contrast between that anxiety in a particular case upon the part of Senators to protect the American people against a danger that is, at least, exceedingly remote in its possibilities while we remain silent when our own people, under our treaties domiciled in Mexico, are being ruthlessly mistreated, in many instances losing their lives, and are being driven from their homes in that country. We remain silent, except to authorize the use of the public money to transport them to the interior of the country.

I think we would do well if we cared a little more for the real thing that is confronting us than to lose our heads over the possibility of a danger that hangs, if it exists at all, so far away on the horizon that we can scarcely discern it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, if it does not interfere with the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Texas, I should like to have it embrace such refugees as shall also be at Douglas and Naco, Ariz. But to be frank with the Senator, I am in hearty sympathy with his resolution, and I would not even suggest this amendment if it in any way embarrasses the measure. I am not informed of any refugees at Naco or Douglas, but there have been many coming through these ports for a long time. I have no doubt conditions exist in these cities somewhat similar to that in El Paso, but not in any way to the same extent. I imagine that if the joint resolution included these two cities, the fund provided will be sufficient to care for them. If the Senator gives his permission, I should like to have those two places included in the joint resolution.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, undoubtedly if the same condition exists at the points designated by the Senator from Arizona as we know exists at El Paso, the same provision ought to be made to meet that condition, and I have no objection at all. I would say to the Senator, however, that it would be necessary to provide the machinery by a further amendment as to the disbursement of the money.

The joint resolution was originally drawn providing that the vouchers should be approved by the commander, his name being stated. It occurred to me that if that commander should happen to die or be removed or sent to another place before the joint resolution was executed we would have a difficulty. So I simply provided for the commander, so that whoever might be the commander at the time could act.

Mr. GALLINGER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The fort is at El Paso?

Mr. BAILEY. Fort Bliss is at El Paso.

Mr. GALLINGER. As to the vouchers, these men will have their railroad tickets and they will be on their journeys. What good will a voucher do after they are on their travels?

Mr. BAILEY. The officer who supplies them with money ought to take their receipts so that he may file them with the War Department as an evidence that the money was expended for the purpose of the appropriation.

Mr. GALLINGER. He will take the receipt when they get their transportation?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that ought to be done.

Mr. BAILEY. All the parties who come within the provision of the joint resolution are now being cared for by the United States through that Army post supplying them with provisions and doubtless with shelter. There are two or three thousand, and I regret to say that information comes even to-day which makes it entirely probable that that number will be augmented within the next 24 hours.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator kindly permit me?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. What class of people are these? Are they driven from mines and other occupations in Mexico?

Mr. BAILEY. From mines, farms, and ranches, and all employment wherever found.

Mr. President, I hardly think that the resentment which the American people are certain to feel against some recent occurrences there ought to be intensified by a recital of them on this floor, and I intended that the joint resolution should pass without any mention of them.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that I did not understand the point the Senator from Arizona suggested, but it occurred to me that probably the same condition exists to some extent at Laredo. I do not know whether it does or not.

Mr. BAILEY. If so, I have not been advised of it, and I doubt it. I am sure it is not so serious there, because the war now desolating our neighboring Republic is near and around El Paso, and the people now being driven by unspeakable barbarities and inhumanities from the Republic of Mexico are crossing into the United States at and near El Paso.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico. He knows all about the situation there.

Mr. FALL. I will state in answer to the question of the Senator from New Hampshire that the States of Tamaulipas, Nuevo Leon, and Coahuila, which are opposite Laredo, are the three States in the Republic of Mexico that are not in armed revolution, and the people who are coming into El Paso are from the lumber industry at Madero, where 269 women and children came out a day or two ago from the mines at Dolores and other mines in Chihuahua and from the American colonies at Casas Grandes and other places. There are a dozen agricultural colonies settled by Americans, and they also come from the ranches, such as the Corralitos Ranch. I have here a telegram about the driving out those people from the colonies and mines of Sonora. The Senator from Arizona is correct about that. There are some of the American citizens from those colonies who are being driven out of Sonora, and they are coming into Arizona through Naco and Douglas. A majority of them are able to come across the country, and even those who come from near Douglas generally come out through El Paso; but some of them are arriving at Douglas and Naco.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I suggest to the Senator from Texas that I think we ought to amend the joint resolution with reference to the words "transportation to such place as he may elect" and insert in lieu thereof "the necessary transportation"? If it becomes a law there is no authority to limit the place by the War Department, because the joint resolution itself specifically declares that the transportation shall be furnished to such places as the party desiring it may elect. He may elect to go with his family to New York, or to Minnesota, or any other place in the United States. I think if you have a limit of only $100,000 most of it would be utilized in transportation and very little for the immediate necessities.

I believe the Senator will agree with me that there ought to be some limitation or some one authorized to determine what would be an appropriate amount to expend for transportation in each particular case.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I am assuming that under the condition which exists there these unfortunate refugees will only ask to be sent to such places as they may reasonably hope to find employment.

If I believed that this generosity of the Government would be seriously abused I would readily accept the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota, but some of those people will go into Idaho, some to Utah, and some probably will go to other parts of Texas. I feel confident that in their present distressful condition they will not attempt to defraud the Government.

It is not a proposition to do more than to send them where they can again become useful to themselves. I think we are hardly authorized to hope that they could go back with safety to Mexico within a reasonable time, and with the harrowing experience through which some of them have passed they will probably never want to go back there at all. I hope the Senator will not insist on that amendment.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] that if it should transpire that places in his State require this provision he can as readily pass it, and more readily, probably, than we are passing this joint resolution; and as he does not know that there is any call for assistance there, I suggest that he leave this to pass and rely upon the willingness of the Senate to respond to his call whenever he finds it necessary to make it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I will adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Texas; but I have in my hand a telegram which led me to make the suggestion. I will not read it for the same reason that the Senator from Texas refrained from stating conditions there, but I know from where the telegram comes that the people of whom the sender of the wire speaks live in the northern part of Arizona, and they would come into the United States either at Naco or Douglas. I said Nogales, but I meant the town of Naco. The refugees of whom this man telegraphs lived in Arizona, as I understand; but adopting the suggestion of the Senator from Texas I shall inquire into the matter. I expect, as he already guarantees, and I know, that the Senate in a case of like necessity will likewise respond to it.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to ask what there is about the situation that we need to treat it so tenderly. If it be a fact that American citizens are passing through harrowing scenes in Mexico, that they are being abused and outraged in contravention of our treaty with Mexico, and their rights, if they are being driven like cattle, barefooted and half clothed, out of Mexico, leaving them in such a state of destitution that we must appeal to the Public Treasury to relieve them, what is there about it that should be treated——

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I will say to the Senator frankly that there are some things I should like to say, there are some things I have been on the point of saying, not only as to the treatment of these people who have fled from Mexico, but as to the treatment of citizens of Texas by the Army of the United States; but I have refrained from doing so, because the Senate has already authorized the appointment of a committee to inquire into this situation, and I thought it better to withhold my observations until that committee has concluded its work and made its report. If that committee finds conditions such as they have been represented to me, then I will join the Senator from Missouri in such plain speech as will be entirely satisfactory to the most warlike disposition.

Mr. STONE. To what committee does the Senator allude?

Mr. BAILEY. The Senate authorized the Committee on Foreign Relations to appoint a subcommittee to inquire into this situation.

Mr. STONE. To inquire, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. BAILEY. And, of course, it will, after inquiring, report to the Senate. That subcommittee has already been designated. I applied to the honorable chairman of it this morning to ascertain when he would proceed with the work, and made some suggestions, and when assured by him that the committee intended to proceed without any lack of diligence, I concluded to postpone what I might otherwise have said now.

Mr. STONE. Is that the committee presided over by the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]?

Mr. BAILEY. It is.

Mr. STONE. Well, that committee, as I understand, is authorized particularly to investigate whether any citizen or person owing allegiance to the United States had been engaged in fomenting rebellion in Mexico. The newspapers have contained statements that Americans were interested in financing and supporting and organizing revolutionary movements in Mexico, and this committee was appointed to find out whether that was true, and, if so, to what extent. I do not understand that the committee has been appointed to make inquiry as to the wrongs done by Mexicans to American citizens; that is outside of the purposes for which that committee was appointed. I think it would be well to have that committee or some other committee authorized to extend the inquiry along that line, so that we might have some authentic data, some sound, reliable information respecting the misconduct of Mexicans in their treatment of American citizens lawfully domiciled in that Republic. Whatever others may say or think or do, for one I intend to continue to register my protest against the Senate and the other House looking on at this spectacle that should bring a blush of shame to every American cheek and remaining silent in the presence of it.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I want to say, and I will detain the Senate no longer than it is necessary to say, that if the committee prosecuting this investigation shall ascertain the condition to be as it has been represented to me, the American Congress will be required to take cognizance of it; but I do not myself feel at liberty to comment upon the things which have been repeated to me, though, in some instances, they have come from correspondence with the most reputable citizens of Texas. I have no shadow of doubt that the statements which they have made are believed by them to be absolutely true. Neither do I doubt—and I question the propriety of saying even this much—that there is now a deliberate and systematic attempt on the part of certain persons to force an intervention upon the United States; but surely Congress will not take a step so serious as that until it is possessed of all the information obtainable and has obtained that information through one of its own committees.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, it was not from any fear of the responsibility involved in the matter, nor was it from any lack of a desire to protect American citizens to as full a degree as would the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], or any other Senator on this floor, that I refrained from reading the telegram. The person who sent it was many miles away from the scene of the trouble. The information he had was from reports of which I personally can know nothing. I do not wish to read sensational telegrams to the Senate, which, after investigation, might possibly prove to be not altogether correct. I repeat it was not from any fear of saying anything which might be necessary here or elsewhere to protect an American citizen in his rights, not only in Mexico, but in any other country, which prevented me from reading the telegram. Before this session comes to its long-delayed end it may become necessary to read not only the telegram now in my hands, but many others, in order that some action may be taken by Congress to relieve the horrible conditions now prevailing in our sister Republic. That something must be done either by the State Department or by Congress at an early date has gone beyond the necessity of argument or further debate.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21279) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, I will say for the information of Members of the Senate that if they will turn to page 53 of the "information print" of the bill on their desks they will see where the Secretary will now resume the reading.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill, beginning on page 37, line 7, and read to the end of line 13, page 37.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon in charge of this bill, if his purpose is to have a session of the Senate to-night? I will state the reason I make the inquiry. There are some Senators who are very much interested in the provision of the bill as passed by the House of Representatives in connection with national aid to Government-used roads who will be compelled to be absent this evening and possibly to-morrow. That provision, with the amendment of the Senate committee, has now been reached. If it is not purposed to have a session of the Senate to-night, I should like to have this amendment go over until Monday. I am very much interested in it, as are other Senators who are cooperating with me, and we are desirous of having the House provision providing aid to roads retained in the bill.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, in reply to the inquiry of the Senator from Virginia, I beg to state that I consider it of the utmost importance that we should, in view of the large amount of appropriations carried in it, expedite the passage of this bill as rapidly as possible. It is my purpose to ask the Senate to hold a session this evening in order to continue the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. Is it the purpose of the Senator to ask the Senate to take a recess, say, at 6 o'clock?

Mr. BOURNE. Yes; until 8 or 8.30.

Mr. SWANSON. Suppose the Senator now submits the request to see if consent can be obtained. Then we shall know whether the question will be considered to-night and whether we shall have to remain here.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, in order to determine the matter, I will ask unanimous consent that the Senate take a recess at 6 o'clock until 8.30 this evening.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Say, 8 o'clock.

Mr. BOURNE. Very well; until 8 o'clock this evening.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that at 6 o'clock the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock, when the Senate shall reconvene. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, under the subhead "Office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General," on page 37, after line 14, to strike out:

That for the purposes of this act certain highways of the several States, and the civil subdivisions thereof, are classified as follows:

Class A shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practically necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide composed of shells, vitrified brick, or macadam, graded, crowned, compacted, and maintained in such manner that it shall have continuously a firm, smooth surface, and all other roads having a road track not less than 9 feet wide of a construction equally smooth, firm, durable, and expensive, and continuously kept in proper repair. Class B shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide composed of burnt clay, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay, sand and gravel, or rock and gravel, constructed and maintained in such manner as to have continuously a firm, smooth surface. Class C shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with ample side ditches, so constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, continuously kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface by dragging or other adequate means, so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times. That whenever the United States shall use any highway of any State, or civil subdivision thereof, which falls within classes A, B, or C, for the purpose of transporting rural or star-route mail, compensation for such use shall be made at the rate of $25 per annum per mile for highways of class A, $20 per annum per mile for highways of class B, and $15 per annum per mile for highways of class C. The United States shall not pay any compensation or toll for such use of such highways other than that provided for in this section, and shall pay no compensation whatever for the use of any highways not falling within classes A, B, or C: Provided, That in calculating or otherwise ascertaining the distance that mail is transported over any highway, such distance shall be measured or calculated in only one direction, and only one use of or travel over any such highway, or any part thereof, on any one trip by a carrier using the same, shall be considered. That any question arising as to the proper classification of any road used for transporting rural or star-route mail shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture. That the compensation herein provided for shall be paid at the end of each fiscal year by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn upon him by the Postmaster General to the officers entitled to the custody of the funds of the respective highways entitled to compensation under this act under and in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed jointly by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General: Provided, however, That no payment shall be made under the provisions of this paragraph for the use of any privately owned or toll road.

The provisions of this paragraph shall go into effect on the 1st day of July, 1913.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That a joint committee shall be appointed, composed of three members of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and three members of the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to be designated by the respective chairmen thereof, to make an inquiry into the subject of Federal aid in the construction of highways and report at the earliest practicable date, and said committee shall have power to employ such clerical and stenographic assistance as may be necessary and conduct hearings, and for the payment of the expenses of such inquiry there is hereby appropriated the sum of $5,000, to be paid upon vouchers signed by the chairman of said committee.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, a number of Senators who are very much interested in this question desired that it should go over, as it is a contested amendment; but, as the chairman of the committee desires that we shall proceed with it now and dispose of it, I shall offer no objection. I desire to make a very short statement to the Senate regarding this amendment and why I think the House provision should be retained in the bill.

This provision was adopted by the House of Representatives by a vote, I believe, of 240 to 89. Consequently it has the indorsement of that body by a vote of practically 3 to 1. It was considered in all of its stages in the House of Representatives. It was considered by the Committee on Agriculture of that body, and reported by that committee to the House, and then adopted by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and made a part of the Post Office appropriation bill in the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, we are now confronted with the proposition whether the Federal Government shall or shall not extend aid for the development, improvement, and construction of highways. I do not propose to make any elaborate address as to whether this should or should not be done. I have previously addressed the Senate in advocacy of the National Government extending Federal aid toward the construction of highways. Whatever may be the views of some, it is a question that must inevitably be met, and one that can not be shirked. The time has arrived, or will very soon arrive, when the people of the United States will demand that the Federal Government shall extend proper aid for the construction, improvement, and development of highways.

The constitutional question involved in this matter has been eliminated, because the provisions carried in the House bill limits the appropriation to rural delivery routes and star routes used by the Government. Hence I will not discuss that question, which has been repeatedly debated, both in the other House and in the Senate.

An amazing condition in connection with public roads exists in the United States. While the United States has succeeded in everything else and almost established a primacy, it is cursed to-day with the worst highways of any civilized nation in the world. We have improved our rivers; we have more miles of railroad than any other country; we have better harbors; we are supreme in finance; and yet in the construction of highways the United States to-day is the most backward of all civilized nations. The question naturally presents itself why this Nation——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator, perhaps, is entirely accurate in his characterization of the highways of the United States. As compared with Germany and England and France our area is so much larger and the number of miles of road so much greater that, of course, our highways are not up to the German, French, or English standard of perfection; but I apprehend that under the great movement now going on in the States for the betterment of roads we probably have as many miles of first-class road in the United States as any other nation in the world. I think we are doing pretty well in that respect; but I sympathize with the Senator in his desire for good roads, and if anything can constitutionally be done to extend the system of highway improvement by the National Government, very likely it ought to be brought about.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, out of the 2,155,000 miles of road in the United States less than 200,000 miles are macadam or hard-surface roads. Not one mile in ten in this country is other than an ordinary dirt road. There is no country in the world so rich, potential, strong, and up to date as is the United States, and yet there is no other civilized country where there is such a disparity between the number of miles of good road and the number of miles of bad road.

Mr. GALLINGER. No, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, while an equal number of miles of good roads are to be found in European countries they have not such great stretch of highway to be improved.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I will say that in proportion to population, in proportion to wealth, in proportion to needs, in proportion to business, in proportion to the commerce passing over the roads, those of the United States are recognized as the worst of any civilized country. Now, the question confronts us, Why does such a condition exist? It is not because of a lack of necessity for good roads. I believe the economic loss to the United States on account of bad roads to-day is greater than from any other source. So, the present condition of the roads of the United States can not be because of a lack of necessity or a lack of profit and benefit that would accrue from good roads. The only reason for the backward condition of the roads of the United States is the bad system of road construction that has existed in this country, in comparison with the systems prevailing in other nations. The same condition that prevails here existed in England until the eighteenth century. Why? Because she had the same method of constructing and improving and keeping in repair her roads that exists in the United States to-day. Until the eighteenth century the roads in England were constructed, improved, and kept in repair entirely by local expenditure and local effort. English roads were noted for their wretchedness and their mud. The roads were so bad even in the vicinity of London that they were almost impassable. Recognizing this, in the eighteenth century England departed from her road law which had been in force from 1555, and commenced a system of road construction under which the nation united with the local authorities in the various counties. France did the same thing. There has been no construction or improvement of roads in any nation except where the burden has been fairly and justly distributed between the central government and the local communities.

New York had no good roads of any consequence until the State government endeavored by its laws to distribute the burden—the State paying so much, the county so much, and the local authorities so much for the improvement of the State roads. In that way a system of good roads was rapidly developed in New York. The same is true of New Jersey, Massachusetts, Virginia, and Indiana. Consequently it is evident that we must have money from a central authority, from a general treasury, State or national, in order to accomplish the results which have been accomplished in some of the States and in other nations.

The question confronts us whether the Federal Government should do anything. Travel over the roads is national, State, and local. Modern conditions are such that no road is used exclusively by the people who live immediately along its course or by the people of the county or the State, but it is used and enjoyed by all the people. Consequently the money to construct the roads and to keep them in repair should be paid from some central source, as the roads are used by the people of all the Nation. With this in view, the Federal Government has heretofore appropriated money for this purpose. It appropriated $14,000,000 for road construction before the Civil War, and it gave 200,000,000 acres of land to increase facilities of transportation by railroad, to benefit towns and communities by providing cheap transportation. There are many communities that are just as much interested in the common road as they are in railroads, and the same reason for extending aid in the one case exists in the other.

When a Government comes to extend aid for roads there are two ways by which it can be done: It can furnish the money and construct the road itself, and it can utilize its own engineers and officers of construction, or it can aid, stimulate, and lend inducement to the local authorities to do the work of road construction and improvement.

Many bills have been introduced in Congress calling for different methods of bringing about this result.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. BOURNE. I should like to ask the Senator whether, in his opinion, the adoption of the House provision will be an incentive for the construction of any more new roads?

Mr. SWANSON. I think it will; but I will get to that at the proper time.

Mr. President, the House provision has been drafted with this idea: Instead of the Government appropriating millions of dollars to construct roads itself, instead of having its own engineers build and improve the roads, it is proposed to appropriate a certain amount of money for two purposes—first, to pay for the use the Government makes of the roads, and, second, to stimulate and encourage the local authorities and the people in the various States and counties to improve their roads and keep them up to a certain standard fixed by the National Government. So the House bill provides that all roads used by the United States Government for star-route purposes and for rural-delivery purposes shall be classified. This includes about 1,200,000 miles of road, which it is proposed shall be classified, so that a road used by a star-route contractor or rural-delivery carrier, if it is a macadam road and measures up to certain requirements, will receive from the Government $25 a mile per year as an inducement to keep the road in good repair and condition. For the use of a hard-surface road, made of burnt clay or otherwise, the United States will pay $20 per mile. For the use of dirt roads measuring up to certain requirements, for instance, that they shall be well drained by ditches, shall be dragged, and shall be kept in reasonably passable condition, the Government will pay $15 a year per mile.

Now, let us see what the total expenditure will be. It can not exceed $18,000,000 a year for all the miles of road used by star routes and the Rural Delivery Service in the United States to-day. It would not amount to that until the roads had been improved sufficiently and kept in such condition as to entitle them to receive payment from the Government.

As to the condition of the macadam and hard-surface roads there can be no controversy. The greatest objection that has been urged to this bill has been because it makes a provision of $15 a mile for the use of dirt roads. The apprehension has been felt by some that that will be simply a waste of money. Let us see whether it will or not. In order to obtain this money that road must be used by a star-route contractor or rural carrier for 12 months. What are the requirements before the money can be paid? First, that the road must be in a certain condition for one year and it must be used by the Government before the money can be claimed. What are the conditions for class C roads as provided in the bill?

Class C shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with ample side ditches, so constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, continuously kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface by dragging or other adequate means.

And follows the condition:

So that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times.

Now, Mr. President, if the dirt roads in the United States were brought to that condition within 12 months from now, were well drained, ditched, and dragged, the Government of the United States could easily afford to pay $18,000,000 that this bill carries to get them in that condition.

You get rid of the holes in the roads; you compel them to be drained; you compel them to have a smooth surface; you compel their continuous dragging; you compel them to be ditched; you compel them to be reasonably passable at all times during the entire year. The bill provides that this condition must exist 12 months before the money is paid.

Now, what would be the result of this appropriation? It is not effective till 1913. From now until the 1st of July, 1913, every road supervisor in the United States will have this proposition submitted to his consideration: Improve your dirt roads and make them macadam roads or make them hard surface and you will get twenty-five or twenty dollars per mile per year for their use, as the case may be. Improve your dirt roads, drain them well, fill up the holes, drag them, keep them passable during 12 months, and at the end of 12 months, in 1914, you can get $15 a mile for their being in that condition.

Mr. President, people laugh at dirt roads. For the next 25 years three-fourths of the traffic of this country must be hauled over dirt roads. It is estimated, from the present cost of hauling, that the United States loses $250,000,000 a year on account of the condition of its roads. It is estimated that 90 per cent of all the internal commerce of the United States passes over the roads an average of 9 miles before it reaches the railroads or harbors for water transportation. Consequently, for the next 25 years at least, we have to depend largely upon the condition of the dirt roads to get better and cheaper transportation; and better and cheaper transportation mean great reduction in the cost of living.

There is this stimulation to this bill. It encourages every community to change its dirt roads to hard-surface roads. It encourages every community to improve its dirt roads and make them passable and make them good. It has been estimated that it will take from thirty to forty or forty-five dollars per annum to keep a dirt road in splendid condition, to keep it smooth, to keep it drained, to keep the mudholes filled, and the United States would be paying about one-third the expense of keeping those roads in that condition.

One advantage of this bill is that all of its benefits do not go entirely to those who will have macadam or splendidly constructed roads. They go to every hamlet, to every village. They give an encouragement and a stimulus to every part of the United States to improve its roads and to keep them in good condition.

Now, no other bill that I have seen introduced has this advantage, of benefiting and stimulating every local community and all sections of the country.

The Senator from Oregon asked me whether I thought new roads would be created because of this bill. Roads are created as they are needed for transportation and traveling purposes.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. In just a moment. But when they are created, then it is necessary to keep them in order.

Now, the advantage of this is that it will improve at once present roads. It will also increase the number of roads where they are needed, because when roads are increased and utilized by the Government this will become operative and the new roads will receive the same pay that other roads receive which are already in existence.

I now yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. BOURNE. Is it not true that, under the provisions of the bill no rental for Government usage can be paid by the Government except for its usage by the rural carrier?

Mr. SWANSON. The rural carrier and the star route, both.

Mr. BOURNE. It includes both?

Mr. SWANSON. It includes both. It includes about 1,180,000 miles of road out of the 2,150,000. In other words, that includes more than half of all the roads in the United States, and that one-half are the roads mostly needed and over which most of the traffic and travel would go.

Mr. BOURNE. But if the Senator will allow me, I do not see where the incentive under the Shackleford measure or the House bill lies for the construction of new roads. I do see where preparation is partially made for the maintenance of roads already used by the Government on the rural and star routes, amounting to over a million miles.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, some wise road builders in the United States who have given the subject great study say that the curse of the United States to-day is too many roads not kept in order, and that we would get along better if we had less roads and put them in order. The problem in the United States is not the building of new roads as much as it is to get the roads into a passable and good condition.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Virginia yield, and to whom?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield now to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been reading the provision carefully within the last two or three minutes, and I want to make one or two practical suggestions to the Senator from Virginia. I am in sympathy with the general proposition, but will there not be a divided responsibility as between the municipality or the State and the General Government in maintaining these roads?

Now, Mr. President, as an illustration, in my own little State we have made very large appropriations from the State treasury—a million dollars at one time—for the construction of good roads, and we have built some roads costing five or six thousand dollars a mile. It takes a very considerable amount of money to keep them in repair. For instance, the oiling of those roads, I think, costs three or four hundred dollars a mile, and we frequently resort to that expedient.

Now, if the United States Government is going to put only $25 a mile into those roads—and that is to be a separate fund—and the State or the municipality is going to expend money for the same purpose, it seems to me there would be a conflict of authority, and that very little good would be done.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator from New Hampshire is correct, and this bill is drawn so as to get rid of the very objection urged by the Senator. The funds are paid over to the authorities who have control of the roads.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is that so?

Mr. SWANSON. They can do what they please with that money.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. SWANSON. The Federal Government has nothing to do with it. It does not watch its expenditure; it does not supervise it. The reason it is fixed that way—and it is wiser—is, first, it prevents the Federal Government from interfering with the State administration; it will relieve the Federal Government from the expense and annoyance of local administration in connection with the roads. Second, the Federal Government does not pay this money until more than double or treble the amount has already been spent to get the roads in good condition and to keep them in that condition for 12 months.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think very likely I did not read the act as intelligently as I should have done. The provision, then, is that the contribution from the General Government shall be paid to the local authorities to augment the funds that are contributed by the municipality, the county, or the State?

Mr. SWANSON. It is paid to the local authorities, because they have for 12 months prior to that time kept their macadam or hard-surface or dirt road in good condition in compliance with the requirements of the law or the requirement fixed by the Federal Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am glad I asked the question, because that clarifies the situation. I read it hurriedly. I was afraid we were to have two funds, a national fund and a State or local fund, and I think that would be unfortunate.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator is correct in that statement, and that difficulty and objection were obviated in the drawing of this bill.

Mr. BOURNE. Will the Senator from Virginia permit me for a moment?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. BOURNE. The bill provides:

> That the compensation herein provided for shall be paid at the end of each fiscal year by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn upon him by the Postmaster General to the officers entitled to the custody of the funds of the respective highways entitled to compensation under this act under and in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed jointly by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General.

Under the terms of the bill I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia to whom he thinks the money will be paid?

Mr. SWANSON. The money would be paid under this bill, which is correct and proper, to the official who, by the law of the State, has charge of the road, who controls it, who improves the road over which the rural carrier goes.

Mr. BOURNE. Under the rules and regulations which may be prepared, but such rules and regulations——

Mr. SWANSON. That fixes the method of payment, the method of receipt, the proper person to receive the money; and the proper person to receive the money is the person who is required to keep the road in the condition required by the Government—the person who has control of it, the person who improves it, the person who ditches it, the person who gets rid of the mudholes, the person who drags it, the person who keeps it reasonably passable during the year.

Mr. BOURNE. Who determines all of that?

Mr. SWANSON. The law determines that. The State law determines the official in the State who has charge of the road, and in this law it is determined that that State official in authority of the road shall receive the money from the Treasury.

Mr. BOURNE. The law prescribes three classifications. The ascertainment as to the classification has to be determined under the provision of the bill. According to the opinion of the department, it would require $750,000 expenditure on the part of the Government in order first to secure that ascertainment.

Mr. SWANSON. What department made that estimate?

Mr. BOURNE. The Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SWANSON. I wish to say in this connection that the Department of Agriculture is opposed to this proposition and appeared before the committee antagonistic to it. The Department of Agriculture is in favor of the Federal Government's appropriating money to construct roads and to build roads with its own engineers.

Mr. BOURNE and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Virginia yield?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I will give way to the chairman of the committee, but after he is through I will try to answer it.

Mr. BOURNE. I simply wanted to say, Mr. President, that I did not want to be put in the attitude in this discussion of being opposed to good roads. I am heartily in favor of good roads. My opinion is, however, that we have not sufficient information upon which to take intelligent action as to the best method of procedure. That was the reason for my support of the committee amendment as a substitute for the House provision.

Now, the Senator from Virginia, as I understand him, made the statement that the bill in the House received almost a unanimous support and vote. I understand there were only 30 or 40 against it.

Mr. SWANSON. No; there were some eighty-odd votes against it.

Mr. BOURNE. Well, it was a very large vote; but, as I understand, this was taken up for consideration by the Committee on Agriculture of the House and under a rule put on the Post Office appropriation bill, and there was no discussion of the bill on the floor of the House. Am I misinformed?

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator is mistaken. There was a very long and full discussion in the House.

Mr. BOURNE. I am correct in the statement, am I not, that is was not discussed in the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House, but in the Committee on Agriculture of the House, and put on the Post Office appropriation bill under a rule.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand, by the consent of a large majority of members of the Post Office Committee, who were satisfied with its wisdom and provisions, and the matter was discussed in the House fully and long. After its discussion, some of the most conservative men in the House gave it their support as the best measure that had been proposed. Ex-Speaker CANNON, a very conservative Member I think, gave it his warm and cordial support, I understand, and after the discussion in the House was convinced it was a wise practical measure which would be fraught with much benefit to the country.

If you are going to have Government aid, what does this bill do? Instead of the Government spending four or five hundred million dollars at the time, as some desire, to construct great highways connecting the large cities, for the use of automobiles, this bill says we will first try to stimulate the local communities and see if we can not encourage them and get them to do the work and to improve their roads. To do this we will include all classes of roads. We will give encouragement so as to stimulate the local authorities and see if they will not improve their roads. I believe it will accomplish good results, because by this local stimulation I believe it will give activity and energy and expenditure for road improvement in every section of this country.

Let us see what will happen for the next 12 months. Here is a supervisor of a dirt road. It is in bad condition now. A rural carrier passes over it. The supervisor will know that, commencing the 1st of July, 1913, if he will get his road in good condition, on the 1st of July, 1914, after he has kept it in good condition for 12 months, he will get from the Federal Government $15 per mile in consideration of that road's having been made and kept in a good condition, fixed by and classified under classification C. That will be a stimulus given to every supervisor of roads in the United States. A man has 10 miles of dirt road to supervise. To-day, if this bill is passed, that man will realize that from the 1st of next July, one year from now, 1913, to the 1st of July, 1914, if he will improve that road, if he will ditch it and drain it and drag it and give it a smooth surface, if he keeps it reasonably passable for 12 months, the Government will contribute $150 at the end of that time. That will be a stimulus which will give force and vigor to road improvement in every hamlet in the United States. Every road supervisor in the United States will have an ambition or have a desire to get his road improved so that it can be put under class C.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield.

Mr. ROOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia why the States do not stimulate their own officers to keep their roads in repair? Does he mean to confess the incompetence of the States to take care of their own roads?

Mr. SWANSON. I will answer the Senator that a great many of the States do, and where the States have done that there has been good stimulation and good road improvement. The State of Virginia—and I recommended it in my first inaugural address—commenced working its convicts and afterwards appropriating money out of the State treasury for the improvement of public roads. The State of Virginia appropriated from its treasury $250,000, to be supplemented by an equal amount by the counties. In every county in Virginia the road question became a live question. First the supervisors had to appropriate an amount equal to what the State gave. Consequently it became a live question. Nearly all of the counties responded. After they appropriated enough to be equal to what the State gave, they went further and appropriated five or six times the amount that the State and the local communities combined did at first. In four years about 400 miles of macadam roads were constructed in Virginia. There is the same condition in New York.

Why was that done? The wealth of this Nation is congregated in the great cities. Take the State of Virginia. Fifty-two per cent of all her taxes are paid by the cities in the State. The country is poor. They can not bear the taxes. The land is poor, and they can not bear the taxes. They can not bear the burden of improving these roads, which are of as much importance to the city as to the country.

When we appropriated $250,000 out of the Virginia treasury and spent it in the country, 52 per cent of it was paid by the cities, and to that extent the cities were aiding in road construction. The cities were willing to do it. They voted for it unanimously, and many cities would have aided in road construction but for the fact that their charters prohibited it.

The large wealth of this country is in the cities, and when you appropriate money out of the Treasury and expend it for good-road construction in the country, to that extent the cities are aiding in road construction in the country. I think it is all right. I think the cities are as much benefited as is the country by improved country roads. City people use them. City people get commerce and trade and traffic, and that is the most efficient way to distribute the burden of road construction—out of the Federal Treasury, out of the State treasury, and then let the local communities pay their part of it.

The Federal Government uses these roads. The Federal Government has a monopoly of the carrying of the mails. No private citizen can engage in that business. It is prohibited by law. The Federal Government has its vast mail system going to all parts of this country. Its mail system goes over the railroads, with its private stockholders. Then it is distributed over 2,000,000 miles of road which have been constructed and over which it has been made possible to carry the mail by the expenditure of money by the people of the country. The railroads receive in payment for carrying the mail over railroads $51,000,000 a year, and when it comes to distributing this same mail over the country roads not a cent, not a dollar, is paid. I say, if the Federal Government pays for its mails, it ought to pay for the transportation of its mails everywhere, because the Federal Government ought to be a model citizen and get nothing without paying for it. It ought to teach a lesson.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. The Senator from Virginia is speaking of roads which are public highways, open to the travel of all classes. He proposes that over those roads everyone shall pass free except the carrier who brings the mail.

Mr. SWANSON. No——

Mr. ROOT. If the State of Virginia chooses to set up tollgates and charge tolls for passage over its roads, I agree that the carrier of the Federal Government should pay tolls just as any other man who drives a horse and wagon over the road. But that the Government of the United States alone shall pay for the privilege of using a road to carry the mails to the people of Virginia, I say is a mere flimsy subterfuge to get money out of the Treasury of the Government.

Mr. SWANSON. Here is the position of the Senator from New York. The State of Virginia does make every citizen of the State who uses her public roads pay—pay in taxes, which are collected and enforced. There is no way to make the Federal Government pay. And all that this proposition is is that the Federal Government shall be generous enough, be a model citizen, and pay for a thing when it uses it and gets the benefit. There is no way by which the State government can tax the Federal Government and make it pay. It is supreme; it is powerful. What I believe is that the Federal Government not only ought to pay a fair price for that privilege and be a model citizen, but I believe it has a sufficient interest in the development of the trade, in the development of the commerce, in the development of the wealth of this Nation, to make it aid in this direction also.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield further to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. ROOT. If the proposition were that the Federal Government should pay into the treasury of the State of Virginia an amount of money equivalent to the amount of taxes on the property of the Federal Government in the State of Virginia, proportionate to the amount of taxes that would go to the keeping up of the roads, I would meet the Senator, but to put the Federal Government alone in the position of having to pay for using a public highway which is free to all the rest of the world, I say is nothing but a subterfuge, a plain, flimsy subterfuge, to get money out of the Federal Treasury and tax the people of this country thousands of miles away to keep up roads in the State of Virginia and other States who want to get this subvention.

I warn the Senator that he can not maintain the sovereignty and the authority of his State if he is going step by step to bring the Federal Government into the payment of the expenses of carrying on of the government of his State.

Mr. SWANSON. In reply to the Senator from New York I will say that I think the Federal Government should pay for any use it makes of property or roads, if it is able to do it. It is an immense expense to the people living along the line of roads. They are taxed and burdened to keep them in condition. I see no reason why the Federal Government should not be a model citizen, and like all other taxpayers, help to keep the roads in condition when it uses them.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me on that doctrine the United States ought to contribute in every city to the maintenance of pavements, both on the sidewalks and in the middle of the streets over which the carriers walk and the mail wagons pass.

Mr. SWANSON. The cities have municipal rights, special charters and special privileges given them by the States, and I am not here arguing the question of the cities. I am here simply saying that the United States Government has an interest in good roads—has as much interest as anybody—and it is as much benefited as anybody, and should contribute to help to keep those roads in good condition, especially when it uses those roads.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. BOURNE. The Government receives no benefit from the use of these roads except the benefit for the general welfare of the community that it serves. I understand the Government is expected to pay a rental for the use of the roads, determined by the classification provided in the bill, of $25 or $20 or $15 per mile. If Congress enacts such legislation as that, why could not a municipality as properly call upon Congress to pay a rental for the use of the sidewalks and the streets for the carriers of letters in the municipality?

Mr. SWANSON. If the Federal Government was satisfied that it would be sufficiently benefited, that it would get a sufficient return, the Federal Government would be justified in making any expenditures where the return is equal and exceeds the expenditure made for its own property and its use.

Now, take this case. Here are 42,000 carriers going about 1,000,000 miles daily over the public roads. A carrier can go 20 miles on a bad road, or possibly 19. He can go on a good road 30 or 40 miles. The Government would save 25 per cent on any rural delivery route if it has a good road over the rural delivery route which was improved and benefited and made passable. It would seem to me that the Federal Government by the use of these roads is interested in their improvement, and that it ought to pay something to improve them and put them in a condition for proper use.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator seems to be proceeding upon the theory that the Federal Government is enjoying a special favor from the community by being permitted to use a road in order to deliver the mails to the citizens living on that road. If the privilege of using the road for this rural mail delivery is a favor to the Government, suppose the Government can not see that in itself as a general proposition it gets any advantage from the rural road? It is expensive. It costs for a carrier, we will say, $1,100 a year, and if then it costs $500 a year additional for keeping up the road, it might conclude that it was a service that was too expensive. What would the Senator say to that?

Mr. SWANSON. I would say to that that the Government has a monopoly of carrying the mails. It has taken that benefit and burden combined on its shoulders. Nobody can engage in the business of carrying the mail. It is done by the Federal Government because it can be done by it better and more economically than anybody else can do it. It has assumed the obligation to give mail facilities quickly, promptly, and immediately to all its citizens. It is one of the special functions of the Government. Having decided to do that, it is its duty to carry the mail to all its citizens. Now, when it carries the mail over a rural delivery route it benefits itself by giving intelligence, by giving wealth, by increasing the population in rural sections. The Government is benefited as much as the citizen is benefited. Then the Federal Government is benefited when it uses the road as its post road, and I do not see any reason why the Federal Government should not pay a part of the amount necessary to keep these roads in use to benefit them, because the Federal Government is improved and benefited by having good roads for the star route, rural delivery, and all the service, in addition to the general benefit that accrues from the development of commerce, the development of the country, and the promotion of the general welfare of the Nation.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Federal Government is maintaining a rural delivery service at a very great expense. It costs from five to six times as much as the service yields in revenue to deliver the mails to the rural communities. And now the Senator from Virginia proposes, in addition to imposing this great tax on the American people to deliver the mails to the rural communities, to tax them and make them keep up the roads in the rural communities, because it is extending this great privilege to the people who live in those communities. To my mind it is the most amazing proposition ever presented to an intelligent body of men for their consideration.

Mr. SWANSON. In regard to the Rural Delivery Service the Senator is mistaken in the attack he has made on the Rural Delivery Service.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. To-day it costs about $42,000,000. It is estimated that it saves in star routes abolished and post offices abolished about $26,000,000——

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON (continuing). Making it cost about $16,000,000. There are 42,000 rural-delivery routes. If there are gathered on each route $400 in postage, the extension of the Rural Delivery Service has not been expensive, nor has it cost anything to the Government if the average postage on each route equals about $400.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia further yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator greatly overestimates the amount of revenue that is collected from the rural routes. There is nothing like $26,000,000 collected from the rural routes.

Mr. SWANSON. I did not make that statement. I said the extension of the Rural Delivery Service by the abolition of the star route service and by the abolition of post offices, it has been estimated, and I have seen the estimate made, has saved about $26,000,000 in that respect, which makes the service cost about $16,000,000 without crediting it with any postage. I said that there are 42,000 of these routes. I do not know how much mail goes over each route, but if there is $400 received in postage it does seem to me that it is not costing the Government anything.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia further yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator is proceeding upon the assumption that $26,000,000 is being collected. The premises upon which the Senator is proceeding are altogether wrong. There is no such amount saved or collected. Now, the Senator speaks of abolishing post offices.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator makes this mistake. I said that the star routes and post offices abolished have saved $26,000,000.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator speaks of the saving of money by abolishing post offices. There have been a number of small post offices abolished where the receipts were very little, but the stamps which were formerly canceled or sold at those post offices are canceled or sold at other post offices, and other postmasters are getting the revenues that formerly went to those postmasters. The Senator knows that in his own State he has had a great deal of trouble at times where a post office was taken away, because the postmaster did not want to lose the revenues of that place and have it transferred to another office. When post offices are abolished there is not any economy in it that amounts to anything, and there is no economy in abolishing star routes of any consequence.

The Senator assumes that I was attacking the Rural Delivery Service. I am not. I am in favor of the Rural Delivery Service, and I think I have done something in my time to promote it.

I think it is a generous contribution the Government of the United States is making for the convenience and benefit of its citizens. But when they claim that because the Government does extend this service at a heavy expense for their benefit it also ought to keep up their roads in order that the mail might be delivered, I say again it is preposterous and almost unthinkable, and I do not believe any considerable number of citizens would demand such a thing. If we are going to make a Federal contribution to the creation of a good-road system in the United States, let us make it openly and squarely and fairly for that purpose and not, as the Senator from New York says, hide behind such a flimsy subterfuge as is contained in the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I wish to say, in justice to the Senator from Kansas, that when I used the word "attack" I possibly used a stronger expression than I intended. I know he has been a good friend of rural delivery. I know when he was Assistant Postmaster General he took a great deal of pleasure in extending the service and doing all he could to make the service efficient.

Now, as to a flimsy excuse, I stated the reason why this money should be appropriated. First, it is because I believe the Federal Government should aid roads. Second, it is because I believe the Federal Government should pay for the use of roads. Both these I consider are sufficient reasons for passing this appropriation. It amounts to a very small sum of money when you consider the benefits that will accrue to the Nation.

The Federal aid of $18,000,000 a year by this provision would do what? It would stimulate road improvement. It would enable and induce the local communities from one end of the country to the other for 12 months to try to improve their roads of all kinds and put them in better condition. It would give a stimulus and create rivalry. They would try to get their roads up to the requirements. I believe the Federal Government would be benefited by the use of these roads. How? Because the 42,000 rural-delivery carriers could travel much farther and could do more work. It would be a saving of five or six million dollars a year in the improved use of roads and in the greater amount of work that the rural carriers could do. I say that the Federal Government, as the user of these roads, can well afford to pay that money to get the increased benefit as a user of the roads.

Then, as to the argument of the enforcement of State sovereignty, there is a disposition always when anything comes to benefit the country, to benefit the farmer, to benefit the masses of the people, to appeal to State sovereignty to defeat it. But when it comes to other purposes, when it comes to other demands and other uses, State sovereignty is not invoked. The rural communities get very little from the Federal Government. Nearly all the public buildings are erected in cities. The amounts expended for river and harbor appropriations are expenditures that do not reach the great masses of the people. It is the average country road that touches the great mass of the people. The Federal Government has given millions and millions of dollars to aid railroad construction, in order to give cheap transportation and develop commerce, and millions of dollars for river improvements to get cheap transportation on the rivers, and I am at a loss to understand why it should refuse to give good sums of money to stimulate road construction in the rural sections.

Now, there is another feature of this bill that I think is beneficial. It does not refuse to benefit the people who have already benefited themselves. Most bills introduced gave nothing to the people who had already built roads. This does. It pays for the use of macadam roads; it gives to hard-surface roads or burnt-clay roads. This bill carries its benefits to all sections of the country and treats them fairly and justly.

If the Federal Government is going into national aid to roads, I believe it is worth while to try this experiment. I believe it will be beneficial; I believe it will produce a road development, a road stimulus reaching the sections of the country where it will produce good results; I believe if we pass this law and come back here in 1914 the road improvement, the development, the benefits that would accrue would be amazing, because you would have every supervisor of every road in the United States active, energetic, and earnest in trying to get the money that would be paid to him for keeping his road in good condition.

Mr. BOURNE. Will the Senator permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. BOURNE. I wish to ask the Senator upon what method of ascertainment was the $25 rental, the $20 rental, and the $15 rental determined? Was it upon the interest or the capital or the charge for deterioration because of the use each day by the rural carrier, or how?

Mr. SWANSON. It was determined in this way, I presume: It was figured about $20,000,000 as the amount the Government could afford to give at this time to road improvement. This bill would amount nearly to $20,000,000 a year if all the roads were brought up to the class required under the provisions.

Now, then, to make it absolutely constitutional, so there could be no question about it, which was necessary to get rid of the objections of some gentlemen, it was limited to star routes and rural-delivery routes, the Constitution giving express powers to the Federal Government in connection with those. This was thought to be the best way to give general aid, fair aid, efficient aid, and at the same time let the Government pay something for the use of the roads. But I can see no reason why the Federal Government can not expend money on roads it uses and put them in a better condition, so it will save the Government large sums of money and at the same time give a stimulus to State, county, and local communities to get all their roads in good condition and keep them in good condition.

Mr. REED and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Virginia yield?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator from Missouri. I have some tables, and so forth, that I wish to put in my remarks. I ask the privilege of putting them in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator has permission.

The tables referred to are as follows:

Statement showing the number and mileage of rural and star routes, furnished by the Hon. P. V. De Graw, Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

1. On April 1, 1912, the total number of star routes in operation was 12,656, the number of miles traveled daily on these routes being 318,280.

2. The star routes, classified as to frequency of service, are as follows:

Times served per week.	Number of routes.	Times served per week.	Number of routes.
1	196	18	102
2	875	19	36
3	2,346	20	9
4	11	21	8
5	1	24	38

8	2	27	3
11	1	28	5
12	1,118	30	4
13	94	32	1
14	53	33	1

3. The total number of rural routes in operation is 42,100, of which 681 are served triweekly.

4. On April 1, 1912, the total number of rural and star routes in operation in each State was as follows:

States.	Rural.	Star.	States.	Rural.	Star.
Alabama	1,017	295	Nevada	3	81
Arizona	11	83	New Hampshire	237	132

Montana	45	209	Total	42,100	12,656
Nebraska	1,047	231

5. The aggregate mileage traveled by rural and star route carriers is as follows:

Rural delivery:
Daily travel	1,010,396
Annual travel	310,191,572
Star route:
Daily travel	318,280
Annual travel	84,678,423
6. The total length of routes is:
Rural delivery	1,018,90[1]
Star delivery	[1] 160,058

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator from Virginia if he has concluded?

[1] Total length of star routes is based upon travel one way only.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator from Virginia if he has concluded?

Mr. SWANSON. At present I am going to yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. REED. For what purpose?

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask whoever has the floor if it would be convenient to yield to a conference report, a privileged question, at the present time?

Mr. REED. I have no objection.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to yield to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] before I yield the floor, as I thought he desired to ask a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I rose to be recognized by the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia has the floor; he has yielded to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]; and the Senator from Missouri yields to the Senator from Wyoming for a privileged question.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. The Senator occupying the floor can, of course, yield to another Senator for an interruption, but he can not abandon the floor and yield it to any Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point is well taken.

Mr. SWANSON. I yielded to the Senator from Missouri, expecting him to ask me a question, and he told me that he intended to make a speech.

Mr. LODGE. That is all right. Then the Senator from Virginia still retains the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia yielded the floor to the Senator from Missouri, and the Senator from Missouri yielded to the Senator from Wyoming for the purpose of making a privileged report.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN submitted the following report (S. Doc. No. 891):

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 24023) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 83, 86, 91, 92, 98, 104, 105, 106, 110, 115, 116, 117, 119, 120, 129, 142, 143, 154, 155, 161, 162, 166, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 187, 192, 244, 250, 251, 252, 254, 255, 256, 257, 260, 261, 262, 263, 269, 271, 272, 279, 280, 288, 289, 291, 293, 294, 296, 297, 298, 300, 303, 304, 305, 307, 308, 312, 316, 317, 318, 319, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 328, 329, 333, 334, 335, 336, 341, 342, 343, 346, 347, 352, 353, 354, 355, 360, 361, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 374, 375, 376, 377, 379, 383, 384, 385, 388, 389, 410, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 423, 424, 426, 428, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 441, 442, 450, 454, 456, 457, 458, 460, 461, 462, 464, 467, 468, 469, 471, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 484, 485, 486, 487, 490, 491, 494, 496, 497, 498, 499, 505, 506, 507, 510, and 515.

"That the Commerce Court created and established by the act entitled 'An act to create a Commerce Court and to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, and for other purposes,' approved June 18, 1910, be, and the same hereby is, abolished and the jurisdiction vested in said Commerce Court by said act is hereby transferred to and vested in the several district courts of the United States.

"All cases pending and undisposed of in said Commerce Court are hereby transferred to and shall be deemed pending in the district court of the judicial district in which the cause of action in the first instance arose, and the venue of all suits and proceedings hereafter brought by or against the Interstate Commerce Commission to enforce, set aside or modify the decrees and orders of the commission shall be in the district court of the judicial district in which the cause of action in the first instance arose.

"The venue in suits brought to enforce an order for the payment of money shall be in the district court of the judicial district in which the complainant resides. The procedure in the district court in respect to cases of which jurisdiction is conferred upon them by this act shall be the same as that heretofore prevailing in the said Commerce Court, and the right of appeal from the district courts in such cases shall be the same as the right of appeal heretofore prevailing under existing law from the Commerce Court. No interlocutory injunction suspending or restraining the enforcement, operation, or execution of any order made or entered by the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be issued or granted by any justice of the Supreme Court, or by any district court of the United States, or by any judge thereof, or by any circuit judge acting as district judge, unless the application for the same shall be presented to a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, or to a circuit or district judge, and shall be heard and determined by three judges, of whom at least one shall be a justice of the Supreme Court, or a circuit judge, and the other two may be either circuit or district judges, and unless a majority of said three judges shall concur in granting such application. When such application as aforesaid is presented to a justice of the Supreme Court, or to a judge, he shall immediately call to his assistance to hear and determine the application two other judges: Provided, however, That one of such three judges shall be a justice of the Supreme Court, or a circuit judge. Said application shall not be heard or determined before at least five days' notice of the hearing has been given to the Interstate Commerce Commission, to the Attorney General of the United States, and to such other persons as may be defendants in the suit: Provided, That if of opinion that irreparable loss or damage would result to the complainant unless a temporary restraining order is granted, any justice of the Supreme Court, or any circuit or district judge, may grant such temporary restraining order at any time before such hearing and determination of the application for an interlocutory injunction, but such temporary restraining order shall remain in force only until the hearing and determination of the application for an interlocutory injunction upon notice as aforesaid. The hearing upon such application for an interlocutory injunction shall be given precedence, and shall be in every way expedited and be assigned for a hearing at the earliest practicable day after the expiration of the notice hereinbefore provided for. An appeal may be taken direct to the Supreme Court of the United States from the order granting or denying, after notice and hearing, an interlocutory injunction in such case; and upon the final hearing of any suit brought to annul, enjoin, or restrain any order of said commission the same requirement as to judges and the same procedure as to appeal shall apply. The provisions of this section shall also apply to the issuing and granting of interlocutory injunctions suspending or restraining the enforcement, operation, or execution of orders made by any administrative board or commission created by and acting under the statute of a State. That in such case the notice required shall be served upon the defendants in the case, and upon the attorney general of the State. All cases pending in the Commerce Court at the date of the passage of this act shall be transferred forthwith to said district courts. Each of said cases and all the records, papers, and proceedings shall be transferred to the district court wherein it might have been filed at the time it was filed in the Commerce Court if this act had then been in effect, and if it might have been filed in any one of two or more district courts it shall be transferred to that one of said district courts which may be designated by the petitioner or petitioners in said case, or, upon failure of said petitioners to act in the premises within 10 days after the passage of this act, to such one of said district courts as may be designated by the judges of the Commerce Court. The judges of the Commerce Court shall have authority, and are hereby directed, to make any and all orders and to take any other action necessary to transfer as aforesaid the cases and all the records, papers, and proceedings then pending in the Commerce Court to said district courts."

And the Senate agree to the same.

F. E. WARREN,
GEO. PEABODY WETMORE,
LEE S. OVERMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. T. JOHNSON,
A. S. BURLESON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WARREN. I ask to have inserted in the RECORD the statement which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Total additions by Senate	$740,740.44
Reductions by Senate	47,440.00
Net amount added by Senate	693,300.44
Senate recessions	336,003.34
House agreements	357,297.10
Restored to House bill items stricken out by the Senate	47,440.00
	404,737.10
Amount of bill as passed House	33,782,854.06
Amount of bill as agreed upon	34,187,591.16
Amount of law for 1912	36,157,209.85
Amount of the estimates for 1913	35,684,267.40
The bill as agreed upon is less than the law for 1912	1,969,618.69
The bill as agreed upon is less than the estimates	1,496,676.24

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. REED and Mr. CUMMINS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I merely wished to say that I do not want this conference report to be adopted without our knowing anything about it. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rose to ask the chairman of the Appropriations Committee to tell the Senate, otherwise than by numbers, what has been done with regard to the chief disagreements between the two Houses in this bill. I am in no position to vote upon the conference report until I know more definitely than I now do just what the conferees on the part of the Senate have agreed to relinquish.

Mr. WARREN. What has the Senator from Iowa especially in mind?

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, I have especially in mind the provisions affecting the Commerce Court and the abolition of the civil-service system. Those are the two I have principally in mind.

Mr. WARREN. As to the Commerce Court, that, of course, has been done away with as a court. The Senate conferees receded from the Senate amendment declaring five places vacant, and agreed to the House provision that there should be no more circuit judges appointed until the number is reduced to 29. On the other hand, the House conferees receded from their disagreement to the Senate amendment providing other modes of transacting the business heretofore transacted by the Commerce Court, with an amendment, which I think the Senator understands, which the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and others helped the Committee on Appropriations to construct.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. REED. It was absolutely impossible for us on this side of the Chamber to understand what the Senator has said. There is some confusion in the Chamber, and he had his face turned in the opposite direction.

Mr. WARREN. I beg the Senator's pardon. In answer to the inquiry about the Commerce Court, I said that the Senate receded from its proposition to abolish five circuit judges. The Senate amendment providing for a transfer of the business of the Commerce Court to the district courts was agreed to with an amendment perfecting it.

Mr. REED. In other words, as this bill is now reported the Commerce Court is retained.

Mr. WARREN. No; there is no Commerce Court; that was done away with by the action of both the other House and the Senate before the bill was sent to conference. The only difference is that there are now 34 circuit judges, and there will be no new ones appointed until the number is reduced to 29, if this bill as now reported becomes a law.

Mr. REED. In other words, the five judges of the Commerce Court keep their offices as judges and continue to draw their salaries?

Mr. WARREN. As circuit judges.

Mr. REED. And then no more circuit judges are to be appointed until the number is reduced to 29?

Mr. WARREN. Not until the number is reduced to 29.

Mr. REED. The Senate succeeded in saving the salary of the judges?

Mr. WARREN. No; on the contrary, the Senate was obliged to recede from its proposition to discharge five judges on the demand of the House conferees. There are no appropriations for the Commerce Court; and there will be no Commerce Court under the bill.

As to the civil-service provision, the House receded from its objection to the Senate amendment, which provided for efficiency ratings. The Senate receded from its objection to the House amendment, which made the term of employment five years, after inserting in it language making the shortest term seven years commencing next September, and providing that those who enter the civil service thereafter will be appointed for terms of seven years, unless sooner separated from the service, with, of course, provision for their reemployment if their standard of efficiency is sufficient. As to those now in the service, they are required during the period of one year after seven years from the 1st of September next to all pass over the line of reappointment or rejection if they are not up to the requirements which the Civil Service Commission may establish.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the effect of the agreement upon the part of the managers of the conference is, I take it, therefore, that the five judges who now constitute the Commerce Court are continued as circuit judges, to be assigned in various parts of the country as the occasion may require. I do not care to discuss that phase of it. I do not believe in constituting our circuit court in that way; but everything has been said—at least on my part—that will be said concerning that subject. I should like, however, to have read just what the managers have agreed to with respect to the procedure in the district courts which now have or will have jurisdiction of the cases heretofore given to the Commerce Court.

Mr. WARREN. I will ask the Secretary to read that portion of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At the request of the Senator from Iowa, the Secretary will read the provision in the conference report to which the Senator refers.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the text of the amended section it is proposed to insert the following:

That the Commerce Court, created and established by the act entitled "An act to create a Commerce Court and to amend the act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, and for other purposes," approved June 18, 1910, be, and the same hereby is, abolished and the jurisdiction vested in said Commerce Court by said act is hereby transferred to and vested in the several district courts of the United States.

All cases pending and undisposed of in said Commerce Court are hereby transferred to and shall be deemed pending in the district court of the judicial district in which the cause of action in the first instance arose, and the venue of all suits and proceedings hereafter brought by or against the Interstate Commerce Commission to enforce, set aside, or modify the decrees and orders of the commission shall be in the district court of the judicial district in which the cause of action in the first instance arose.

The venue in suits brought to enforce an order for the payment of money shall be in the district court of the judicial district in which the complainant resides. The procedure in the district court in respect to cases of which jurisdiction is conferred upon them by this act shall be the same as that heretofore prevailing in the said Commerce Court, and the right of appeal from the district courts in such cases shall be the same as the right of appeal heretofore prevailing under existing law from the Commerce Court. No interlocutory injunction suspending or restraining the enforcement, operation, or execution of any order made or entered by the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be issued or granted by any justice of the Supreme Court, or by any district court of the United States, or by any judge thereof, or by any circuit judge acting as district judge, unless the application for the same shall be presented to a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, or to a circuit or district judge, and shall be heard and determined by three judges, of whom at least one shall be a justice of the Supreme Court, or a circuit court judge, and the other two may be either circuit or district judges, and unless a majority of said three judges shall concur in granting such application. When such application as aforesaid is presented to a justice of the Supreme Court, or to a judge, he shall immediately call to his assistance to hear and determine the application two other judges: Provided, however, That one of such three judges shall be a justice of the Supreme Court, or a circuit judge. Said application shall not be heard or determined before at least five days' notice of the hearing has been given to the Interstate Commerce Commission, to the Attorney General of the United States, and to such other persons as may be defendants in the suit: Provided, That if of opinion that irreparable loss or damage would result to the complainant unless a temporary restraining order is granted, any justice of the Supreme Court, or any circuit or district judge, may grant such temporary restraining order at any time before such hearing and determination of the application for an interlocutory injunction, but such temporary restraining order shall remain in force only until the hearing and determination of the application for an interlocutory injunction upon notice as aforesaid. The hearing upon such application for an interlocutory injunction shall be given precedence, and shall be in every way expedited and be assigned for a hearing at the earliest practicable day after the expiration of the notice hereinbefore provided for. An appeal may be taken direct to the Supreme Court of the United States from the order granting or denying, after notice and hearing, an interlocutory injunction in such case; and upon the final hearing of any suit brought to annul, enjoin, or restrain any order of said commission the same requirement as to judges and the same procedure as to appeal shall apply. The provisions of this section shall also apply to the issuing and granting of interlocutory injunctions suspending or restraining the enforcement, operation, or execution of orders made by any administrative board or commission created by and acting under the statute of a State. That in such case the notice required shall be served upon the defendants in the case, and upon the attorney general of the State. All cases pending in the Commerce Court at the date of the passage of this act shall be transferred forthwith to said district courts. Each of said cases and all the records, papers, and proceedings shall be transferred to the district court wherein it might have been filed at the time it was filed in the Commerce Court if this act had then been in effect, and if it might have been filed in any one of two or more district courts it shall be transferred to that one of said district courts which may be designated by the petitioner or petitioners in said case, or, upon failure of said petitioners to act in the premises within 10 days after the passage of this act, to such one of said district courts as may be designated by the judges of the Commerce Court. The judges of the Commerce Court shall have authority, and are hereby directed, to make any and all orders and to take any other action necessary to transfer as aforesaid the cases and all the records, papers, and proceedings then pending in the Commerce Court to said district courts.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I should like to have the Secretary reread that portion of the proposed amendment which refers to the laws of a State. I did not catch that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The provisions of this section shall also apply to the issuing and granting of interlocutory injunctions suspending or restraining the enforcement, operation, or execution of orders made by any administrative board or commission created by and acting under the statute of a State. That in such case the notice required shall be served upon the defendants in the case, and upon the attorney general of the State.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is sufficient. I think it is a bad provision; but I think it is substantially as we agreed to it in the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there are two points with regard to the substitution of the conference committee which I think deserve a little further inquiry and investigation. They are these: First, the law which we passed in 1910 provides that all suits brought to set aside on appeal an order by the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be brought against the United States eo nomine. A later provision in the law gives the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to intervene.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. JONES. It seems to me that this matter is likely to create considerable discussion, and that the conference report ought to be printed so that we may study it and ascertain what it means.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was about to point out one or two objections in order to justify a request that the report shall be printed so that we may examine it, and I will now make that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks that the report go over and be printed. Is there objection?

Mr. WARREN obtained the floor.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me to make a suggestion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I notice in the reading of this amendment that it refers in one or two places to the "circuit court judge." Of course, there is not any such officer as a circuit court judge, because there is not a circuit court. It should be "a circuit judge." It is evidently a mere clerical error, and I suggest to the chairman of the committee that perhaps that could be corrected without sending the report back. It ought not to go into the law in that form, at any rate.

Mr. WARREN. What is the Senator's suggestion?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. To strike out the word "court." The title of the judge is "circuit judge," not "circuit court judge."

Mr. GALLINGER. That will take it back to conference.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator desire to send the report back to conference?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Wyoming is not to be blamed for that error. I am sure it was in the amendment which I offered. I took that language from the law which was in force at the time when there were circuit court judges and it has been allowed to pass through without notice, apparently. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is right, of course. However, is there any reason why the report should not be printed?

Mr. WARREN. I am glad the Senator places the blame where it belongs and not with the managers of the conference. I think the Senator will remember that when we came to this part of the bill on its passage through the Senate I asked the learned lawyers of this body to provide the necessary machinery for the transfer to other courts of the business heretofore done by the Commerce Court, and when the matter was so furnished here and voted in, I assumed that it was correct, but upon investigation, finding that there were differences, the matter was referred to the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Minnesota and also leading gentlemen representing the House.

This proposition of change now comes entirely as a new matter. Possibly I had better withdraw the report and submit it to the House conferees and change it. You can not call it a clerical error, because it is not the error of a clerk.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is a clerical error in a sense. I suppose I directed the clerk to copy the existing law upon that subject, with reference to another matter, and the words "circuit court judge" were in that law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think the Senator from Iowa is taking upon himself some blame that does not belong to him.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to relieve the conferees.

Mr. WARREN. Put it all on the conferees.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think that the suggestion that I made at first is exactly correct. It is a clerical error. As it appears in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa the correct term is used, and the term "circuit judge" is used in most of the cases where the official is referred to. I suggest to the Senator it is a mere clerical error, and it seems to me it could be stricken out without being referred to the House.

Mr. GALLINGER. It could not.

Mr. WARREN. Let me say a word with respect to the suggestion that the report be printed. I desire to have it finished to-night, if practicable, for many reasons. I think the better way is to withdraw the report and for me to get into communication with the managers on the other side; and I will ask the Senators who have mentioned the fault to mark a bill, so that this later view will prevail, and I will try to arrange it. I shall be glad if later in the day we can take it up, so as to accommodate the Members on the other side, who have been exceedingly obliging, because two of those Members desire, for the best of reasons, to have the report considered over there in the morning.

Mr. CUMMINS. There are, however, two matters which are not mere clerical errors, upon which there is some difference of opinion. The distinguished Senator from Minnesota believes that the substitute of the managers means one thing; I am constrained to think that it means another, and it is so vital that I should like an opportunity to reflect upon it and confer a little upon it. For instance, this amendment says that all suits brought by or against the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be brought in such and such a district. Now, the very suits in which the people of this country are most vitally interested are the suits brought by the railroad companies against the United States for the purpose of canceling or annuling an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. WARREN. As Senators know, we can not compose those differences here. Either the report must be accepted or rejected, because if there are differences of that kind they can not be composed by any laying over or withdrawal or printing. I regret that there should be such a condition.

Mr. CUMMINS. I feel a very great interest in this phase of the case. I think we ought to have an opportunity to consider it carefully. I will be compelled to state my views with regard to the matter if a vote upon the report is asked at this time.

Mr. WARREN. What I suggested was that we let the matter go over until we meet at 8 o'clock this evening, and perhaps the Senator could, in the meantime, advise himself as to the true status of the matter.

Mr. CUMMINS. That would suit me. I already have an opinion in regard to it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It seems to me we can have an intelligent composition of our differences better after reading the report when it is in print than by considering them now. There are certain very important matters in this report, one relating to the civil service. I should like to see what the conferees have agreed upon in reference to that before action is taken upon the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. WARREN. What was the motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion was that the report go over and be printed.

Mr. NEWLANDS. To what time will the report go over?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No time was designated.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Washington does not seem to be in his seat. Was it the Senator from Washington who made the motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was the Senator from Washington.

Mr. WARREN. I was about to ask him to withdraw the motion, in view of the one or two words which Senators think should be corrected.

Mr. BORAH. I did not understand that the Senator from Washington asked that the report go over. He was about to suggest it, when the Senator from Iowa finally himself made the suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the Senator from Iowa made the motion. Is the motion withdrawn?

Mr. BORAH. It is under the control of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senate desires, let it go over. I have only to say that some of the Senators who have been at work on this for some weeks have to go into conference on another important bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming has asked to withdraw the report temporarily, as the Chair understands.

Mr. WARREN. I am willing, on the request being made, that the report be withdrawn to correct, if possible, a word or two—what Senators, as they term it, deem a clerical error. I will ask unanimous consent to withdraw it for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent——

Mr. REED. Then it will be printed? That is understood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to withdraw the report.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the report, and, if possible, to correct what Senators term a clerical error.

Mr. REED. Will it be printed when it is returned, so that we may read it?

Mr. WARREN. I will bring it before the Senate and——

Mr. REED. In order to save any question about that, I move that the report be printed.

Mr. WARREN. That cuts off my opportunity to make this correction, of course.

Mr. REED. Oh, no. I do not mean it in that way. If the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming has withdrawn the report by unanimous consent. It is not before the Senate for a motion to print.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the report is withdrawn, it is not in possession of the Senate, and no motion can be made concerning it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so holds.

Mr. REED. I did not understand that unanimous consent had been granted. I do not care to stand on a technicality, however. I take it that the Senator, having asked to withdraw the report, when he presents it again will do so in such manner that we shall have an opportunity to have it printed.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21279) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

Mr. BOURNE. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] had the floor when the conference report was presented.

Mr. REED. I understood the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] had the floor. I had the floor and yielded to him, and he addressed the Chair.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President and Senators, I am very much opposed to the provisions of the House bill which a moment ago were being discussed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. If the Senate will bear with me for a few moments, I will try to tell, first, why I am opposed to the provisions of the House bill with regard to the sort of Government aid thereunder extended to public roads; secondly, what sort of provision it seems to me ought to take the place of it; and third, why it is perfectly clear to my mind, as it was to the mind of John C. Calhoun, perhaps the strictest constructionist of the Constitution that ever lived except Jefferson Davis, that the Government has a right to extend aid to post roads.

I am opposed to the provisions in the House bill because they are at once dribbling and driveling, and until something substantial can be done, I am in favor of the Government not attempting to do anything.

The Senator from Virginia says the provision of the House bill will stimulate the building of good roads. The Senator from Virginia is mistaken. The House provision will stimulate nothing except road supervisors to make proper certificates in order to get $25 or $20 or $15 per mile per annum, and will result in no good at all to the cause of good roads.

The House provisions are a delusion, a snare, a farce, apples to the eye and ashes to the taste. They are a sop thrown out to Cerberus, the people, in order to keep them quiet upon the subject of building good roads.

The idea of contributing $25 per mile per annum to this sort of a road—I must read the provision—a road to construct which would cost from $2,000 to $2,500 per mile upon the average in the United States, and in my own country twice that amount, owing to the fact that the material would have to be brought long distances—a road "composed of shells, vitrified brick, or macadam."

Under the House provision that road will receive an aid of $25 per mile per annum. It is like saying when you go to improve the Mississippi River, let us say, that you will contribute a hundred dollars a mile, the hundred dollars to be spent each year on each mile of the course of the main stream. That is no way to build roads. You must make one road good, then you must make another good, and then a third and then a fourth. There must be some scheme whereby that could be done with fairness to the States and the several sections of the Union.

The next road is a road "well drained, composed of burnt clay, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay," and so forth, and to that road there is extended the munificent aid of $20 per mile. In my own county we have large and extensive gravel beds, and a good gravel road costs from twelve to fifteen hundred dollars per mile. That is a little bit over 1½ per cent, although I have not time to calculate it exactly.

Then comes class C, to which is extended the sum of $15 per mile. It provides:

> Class C shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with ample side ditches, so constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, continuously kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface by dragging or other adequate means, so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times.

That is an ordinary dirt road. To that is extended $15 per mile, which comes nearer being a reasonable aid than the aid extended to any other class of roads under the bill.

These are the aids that are provided in this bill for the roads of the country. I submit that the aids are both driveling and dribbling; that no human being with a particle of sense can believe they will be of any substantial benefit in road building; that the aggregate amount of money paid by the United States Government will be very large, and that the amount of money received by any mile of road will be infinitesimal; it will be negligible; it can do no good at all.

My own idea of how the Government should aid in roads, if it shall do it at all, is about this: The Government should contribute a lump sum per annum to be devoted to road building, upon condition that the State shall contribute an equal amount and the county, or in New England, where the township system prevails, the town, or in Louisiana the parish, shall contribute an equal amount, being one-third for each, because each shares in the benefits, and that lump sum should be divided and expended approximately in equal amounts in each State in proportion to the population of the State, excluding from the count cities of 100,000 population and over, so that substantial aid and assistance may be rendered. I want to be brief, and I shall not enter into the details of that proposition. I leave it to each Senator to amplify and to explain in his own mind.

The one point that I want to settle now beyond all doubt and peradventure is the constitutional right of the Federal Government to aid in road building, provided the roads are post routes. The clause of the Constitution to which I refer is in section 8 of Article I, and reads as follows, giving the powers of Congress, substantially the powers of the Federal Government, "to establish post offices and post roads." That is the express language under which the Federal Government has undertaken to erect post-office buildings, and it is the only clause of the Constitution under which it could have erected a single post-office building in the United States. The words "post offices" are followed by "post roads." If the phrase "to establish post offices" be construed, as it uniformly has been construed, to mean to build a post office, then to establish a post route also means to build a post road or post route.

One of the clearest arguments ever made in favor of that provision was made by the apostle of strict construction, John C. Calhoun himself. The question comes upon me rather as a surprise to-day; I wish I had his language and could quote it, but it was as clear and as conclusive as his utterances almost uniformly were.

Now, Mr. President, reasoning from the reason of the thing as well as from the direct language of the Constitution, the United States Government has never hesitated to aid in the construction of railroads. It aided in the construction of the transcontinental line, and based its action upon two grounds—the right to make interstate commerce easy and cheap and the right to establish a railway post route for the carriage of its mails. So this holds, even if I were forced to resort to an implied power—and no good Democrat ever denied the doctrine of implied powers, as so many people have said they did. They have merely asserted that an implied power must be a necessary inference from an express power; that it must be necessary and not inferential by metaphysical reduction to the end of the limit. A railroad contributes in no greater kind, although in greater degree, to the facilities and cheapening of interstate commerce than a river, and our improvement of rivers has rested entirely upon that ground. It contributes no more in kind, though it does in degree, than does a country road.

The main reason why men who are so easily satisfied of the constitutionality of everything that can be jumped up have hesitated about acceding to the constitutionality of the power of the Federal Government to aid in post routes has been the fact that aiding in post routes seemed upon the surface of it to help nobody but small interests of a rural character. The real truth, however, is that good roads help everybody. They help the railroad and the water transportation companies more than anybody in the beginning. They help the ultimate consignee of the goods. They help the producer of the goods. The Federal Government has just as much right to aid in making interstate commerce cheaper and easier by aiding in the construction of highways without rails laid upon them as in the construction of highways with rails laid upon them.

My opposition to the House provision is that it is a delusion, that it is a snare, that it is a sop thrown out to Cerberus, that it will have a tendency to discourage the agitation for good roads and to make the people who have not time to follow the matter believe that they have something when they have nothing.

Although as a rule I am willing to take a half loaf where I can not get a whole one, I am not willing to take .0001 as a part of a loaf instead of an integer. This does not amount to 1 mill on the dollar, not one-tenth of 1 per cent, if I am figuring aright in my mind. I was afraid to say so, but I believe it is less than that. I believe that it goes to the next decimal. But whatever it may be, I want to assert the right of the common people of this country engaged in agricultural pursuits to the expenditure of some reasonable proportion of the immense amounts of money that are yearly spent, most of it, by the way, for absolutely unproductive purposes.

There is no better investment than a good road. It is not only an investment returning a dividend in money, it returns a dividend in school attendance, in church attendance, in neighborhood sociability, which have an effect toward higher culture. It returns a dividend in better morality, because there can be better enforcement of law and better attendance at church and at school. But I do want to warn the people as well as Senators of the fact that I can see nothing in these House provisions except an attempt to persuade me and men like me to convince ourselves that we have accomplished something. It is an old adage that a man is a criminal who fools another, but a man is not only himself a criminal but a fool who undertakes to fool himself, and I for one am not willing to try to fool myself with this sort of a sop.

I now yield the floor.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 24450) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4663) granting to the Washington-Oregon Corporation a right for an electric railroad and for telephone, telegraph, and electric transmission lines across the Vancouver Military Reservation in the State of Washington.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18642) to reduce the duties on metals and manufactures of metals and further insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3 and 4 to the bill upon which the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

INCITEMENT OF INSURRECTION IN MEXICO.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent that the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] be appointed a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations in conformity with Senate resolution 335 authorizing the Committee on Foreign Relations to investigate whether any interests in the United States have been or are now engaged in inciting rebellion in Cuba and Mexico.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] be appointed as an additional member of the subcommittee to make the investigation required by Senate resolution 335. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—SEMICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION OF EMANCIPATION.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I rise for a few minutes to a question of personal privilege.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will proceed.

Mr. BRADLEY. My attention being called to a severe stricture in a leading newspaper on my action the 24th of July concerning the amendment proposed by me to the sundry civil bill providing for an appropriation for the holding of the semicentennial anniversary exposition, and for other purposes, charging, among other things, that I was guilty of mendacity, I therefore promptly reviewed the proceeding in the RECORD and discovered, much to my surprise, that misunderstanding a question propounded by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD], I had unwittingly given an incorrect answer. This grew out of my defective hearing, which at that time was greatly augmented by a cold. Showing the extent of that disability, I refer to the fact that although the presiding officer [Mr. GALLINGER] announced after the vote that the amendment had passed, misunderstanding his ruling, I called for the yeas and nays, whereupon he explained that the amendment had already been adopted.

It appears from the RECORD that the Senator from South Dakota, speaking of the exposition act, asked, "Did not that act itself make an appropriation?" to which I responded, "It did not." In offering the amendment I had in mind the fact that as the House had not passed the bill making the appropriation the amendment was open to a point of order, and hence I understood the Senator as making an inquiry concerning the action of the House, and when I made the answer expected him to raise the point of order.

It is no less than ridiculous to suppose that I should have answered his question in the negative with any purpose of misrepresentation, first, because nothing could have been gained by the answer, and, secondly, because three-fourths of the Senators present knew it was manifestly untrue. The bill had been thoroughly discussed preceding its passage by the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr HEYBURN], the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and myself, and for this reason the fact that the bill carried an appropriation was, as I have said, well known to a large majority of the Senators present. The point of order of Senator SMITH of Georgia, on which the amendment went out, was that the Senate had passed the bill carrying an appropriation, which bill was then pending in the House and not acted upon, the failure to act in the House alone being material.

I am criticized in the article mentioned for attempting to procure an appropriation for the benefit of a private corporation.

The present bill is substantially along the lines of some others enacted heretofore providing for expositions. The object of the bill was public, namely, to "illustrate the history, progress, and present condition of the negro race and to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the proclamation of emancipation by President Lincoln," and was conditioned that the corporation having the matter in charge should raise not less than $50,000 for the enterprise.

Showing the justice and propriety of the bill and the estimation in which it was held by the Senate, it is proper to add that it was, after amendments, reported favorably by unanimous consent, irrespective of party, by the Committee on Industrial Expositions, 10 members of which were present. Not only so, but after the bill had been thoroughly discussed in the Senate it was passed without a dissenting vote.

The sundry civil bill, as you all know, is passed toward the conclusion of Congress, and frequently where one branch has failed to act amendments providing for appropriations are passed by the branch which has acted, which amendments, when agreed upon in conference, render the legislation effectual There was therefore no impropriety in the amendment proposed, and such amendments are frequently passed.

THE POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21279) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have no more doubt than the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] as to the constitutional power of the Government of the United States to establish post roads or aid in establishing post roads, but the question of the United States entering upon that policy is a very large question, indeed. If we are to enter upon it, it will involve the expenditure of many more millions than the Panama Canal will have cost, and it ought to be done, as the Senator from Mississippi pointed out, only after most ample consideration, and on a broad, well-understood, well-arranged plan, so that for the millions we expend we may get the value and the return we desire in good roads.

I do not propose to discuss the merits of that policy, but I do want to say a few words in regard to the proposition embodied in the bill as it comes from the House. I can not add materially to the argument made by the Senator from Mississippi against this clause, but I can add, I think, something in the way of illustration.

My objection to the House provision is that it is a sheer waste of money. It is throwing away $16,000,000, which the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] did not seem to think a very important sum. It is sixteen millions without the classification expense, without the expense of inspection. It is throwing it away. There will be no return. It will not be a stimulus to good roads; it will be a premium on the maintenance of bad roads in keeping them as they are.

Mr. President, the State of Massachusetts has gone into the improvement of the roads very extensively. The State roads of my State, I believe, to be as good roads as exist anywhere in the world; and I have been over the roads of France and England, which have a very high reputation. The State roads are as good in their construction as the park roads of the Government here in the neighborhood of Washington. The State has built 879.6 miles of State highways in Massachusetts. It has cost the State $8,000,000 to build those 879 miles. It costs the State $500,000 a year, between six and seven hundred dollars a mile, to keep those roads in good repair and in order.

Mr. President, a road of that character is, of course, the easiest road to keep in repair, owing to the fineness and perfection of its construction. In England, on the Continent, and in this country to keep a macadam road in repair after it has been built costs from $250 to a thousand dollars a mile. To build those State roads which I am describing and which are, of course, much finer than the macadamized roads, costs in the neighborhood of from nine to ten thousand dollars a mile, for roads built as automobile roads, with oiled surfaces and all that.

The little town in which I live, the smallest town in area in the State of Massachusetts, has only 11 miles of road. It has maintained extremely good macadamized roads. It is also at the end of a star route, the mails being carried 4 miles from the city of Lynn to the village of Nahant, where I live. I have been familiar all my life with the appropriations for and the construction of the roads in that town. The average cost to that town of maintaining 11 miles of macadamized roads has been over $10,000 a year. We had as good macadamized roads as there were in the State. The place is one to which many people drive in the summer, and many automobiles pass over the long neck of land lying between Lynn Bay and the Atlantic Ocean; and the automobiles destroyed those macadamized roads, good as they were, and it became absolutely necessary to rebuild them. To build 2½ miles of road fit to carry that automobile traffic, which is very heavy over those roads, will cost the town this year $41,000. Those two and a half miles and a mile and a half more are traversed by a star route, and you propose to give that town $100 to keep those 4 miles in order, when it now costs them a thousand dollars a mile to keep their macadamized roads in proper order.

The money would be thrown away on those roads, Mr. President. Nobody would know that the money had been spent. It would be a sheer waste. Where there is a fine road the amount is so trifling that it never would be heard of; it would be turned into the town treasury and lost sight of. Yet that is the amount proposed to be given for the best kind of roads; and when you come to the dirt roads, $15 a mile, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] said, would be like giving a hundred dollars a mile to maintain the levees on the Mississippi River.

It would be a sheer waste of money to take $16,000,000 and spend it in this way. If we are going to have the United States enter upon a policy of good-road building, as we have an undoubted constitutional right to do, that is a great policy to be carried out in conjunction with the States, the cities, the towns, and counties in a proper manner after full consideration. It will cost much more than $16,000,000 to do anything effective; but when we expend whatever amount shall be determined upon we shall get returns; we shall get very many miles of good road every year, while under this proposed plan you would take $16,000,000 a year and throw it away. You propose to give $15 a mile to keep a dirt road in repair. It is only a premium to leave it a dirt road.

Mr. President, if we are going to enter on the policy of building good roads, let us enter on it in the spirit and in the manner which such a great policy demands and not with a helter-skelter appropriation which would simply waste the money of the Government and mislead the people of the United States into the belief that we are doing something in behalf of good roads when we are doing nothing of the kind.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the question of good roads is a more important question in the newly settled regions than it is in the older portions of the country. What are called roads in New England are practically streets. The country is so thickly settled with villages and towns that you are only out of one to pass into another, and I can realize the importance to those people of maintaining the highest class of roads; but there is another class that bears a closer relation to the growth of the country, and that is the roads in the Western States without limit to the Pacific coast. We started with trails—long trails, with 20, 30, or 50 miles between places of consequence—over which the mail is packed on the backs of animals or carried upon the shoulders of men. In most instances we have developed those trails into roads traveled with vehicles, crude at first, but built at the expense of the people directly interested in their construction and maintenance, in order that not only the mails might be carried and that people might be able to pass from one section of the country to another, but in order that the commodities of the country might be carried to the markets and from one town to another, or from town or country to the lines of transportation.

We are intensely interested in the question of good roads, and we would welcome an era of construction and maintenance entered upon by the Government; but we do not want the Government to contribute to the construction and maintenance of dirt roads. When the Government enters upon this class of work it should be for the construction of roads up to the standard of the highest use, not all at one time, but continuously and gradually; not roads one part of which would be worn out before the other part was constructed, but a system of progressive construction that would result within a reasonable time in a system of permanent good roads.

That is the only system to which I would be willing to vote any money whatever. I would not vote a dollar for the repair of old roads by the Federal Government; I would leave that to the local governments. I would have a Government road constructed by the Government of such a character that it would be recognized as soon as noticed, so that the only expense thereafter would be the minimum expense of maintaining a good road. It costs infinitely less to maintain a good road than it does a bad road, and after you have maintained a good road you have something with which to be satisfied, while after you have maintained a bad road you are no better off than you were when you started. So that I do not believe the legislation upon which this system is to be based should be contained in an amendment to an appropriation bill. I believe we should have reports from competent engineers, embracing the whole system of roadways in the United States, and then, acting upon those reports, commence a systematic construction of roads. After they are constructed, I would see to it that adequate provision was made for their maintenance and repair. It would be easy to determine what was necessary, what force of men would be required, and the system of organization best adapted to the maintenance of those roads. While I am sincerely in favor of the construction and maintenance of roads by the Government, I am not in favor of entering upon a system that would only afford an excuse for condemnation and for final abandonment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask to have printed as a part of my remarks that portion of the pending bill relating to roads which is proposed to be stricken out by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, without objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

That for the purposes of this act certain highways of the several States, and the civil subdivisions thereof, are classified as follows:

Class A shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practically necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track of not less than 9 feet wide, composed of shells, vitrified brick, or macadam, graded, crowned, compacted, and maintained in such manner that it shall have continuously a firm, smooth surface, and all other roads having a road track not less than 9 feet wide, of a construction equally smooth, firm, durable, and expensive, and continuously kept in proper repair. Class B shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide, composed of burnt clay, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay, sand and gravel, or rock and gravel, constructed and maintained in such manner as to have continuously a firm, smooth surface. Class C shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with ample side ditches, so constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, continuously kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface by dragging or other adequate means, so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times. That whenever the United States shall use any highway of any State, or civil subdivision thereof, which falls within classes A, B, or C, for the purpose of transporting rural or star-route mail, compensation for such use shall be made at the rate of $25 per annum per mile for highways of class A, $20 per annum per mile for highways of class B, and $15 per annum per mile for highways of class C. The United States shall not pay any compensation or toll for such use of such highways other than that provided for in this section, and shall pay no compensation whatever for the use of any highway not falling within classes A, B, or C: Provided, That in calculating or otherwise ascertaining the distance that mail is transported over any highway, such distance shall be measured or calculated in only one direction, and only one use of or travel over any such highway, or any part thereof, on any one trip by a carrier using the same, shall be considered. That any question arising as to the proper classification of any road used for transporting rural or star-route mail shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture. That the compensation herein provided for shall be paid at the end of each fiscal year by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn upon him by the Postmaster General to the officers entitled to the custody of the funds of the respective highways entitled to compensation under this act, under and in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed jointly by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General: Provided, however, That no payment shall be made under the provisions of this paragraph for the use of any privately owned or toll road.

The provisions of this paragraph shall go into effect on the 1st day of July, 1913.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there is a singular contrariety of views expressed by the Senators who oppose this measure, but they all succeed in developing the same philosophy, namely, that nothing is to be done for roads at the present time, and that the longer the adoption of any plan is delayed the better it will suit them. The House provision is very short and plain. It is not intended at one time to produce perfect roads; it is intended to encourage and promote the building of good roads. I believe if it is enacted into law the result will be a nation-wide movement in the direction of road improvement.

One of the objections urged to this provision in the bill is that we should build no roads until we build permanent roads. Mr. President, there is no such thing as a permanent road; there has never been a permanent road constructed, and there never will be. There are roads which last longer than others, but if you build the highest class of macadam road it will, under heavy travel, speedily disintegrate. In the course of a few years, unless it is constantly repaired, it will become as bad as the original dirt road. The fact I assert is sustained by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who proclaims that some 10 miles of road near a city in his State has cost a thousand dollars per mile per year for maintenance. The Senator from Massachusetts states that it cost $41,000 to construct 2½ miles of rock road in the State of Massachusetts. If it costs that much to build the so-called permanent roads, we might as well abandon the hope of ever having roads of that character, for the value of property in the farming districts of the United States would not sustain the burden. If the Government or the States undertake to improve the roads of the country at a cost of nearly $20,000 per mile, the National and State Governments will be bankrupted and the plan will fail. The proposition of permanent roads to be built by the Federal Government is, therefore, a fallacy, if we adopt the standard suggested by Senators who have preceded me.

There is another question involved which I want to touch upon. If the Government of the United States proposes to enter upon the improvement of roads and adopts the plan of what have been termed permanent, that is to say, very high-priced roads, I want to know where those roads will be built, and the people of the United States will want to know where they are to be built. Manifestly such roads can only reach a small part of the country. Are you to construct one road across the country from east to west? If so, of what value will that road be to the people who live 40 or 50 miles away from it? Are you to construct another road from north to south? If so, of what value will that road be to the people who live a few miles from it? It is manifest if you start upon such a plan as that it will be years and years beyond the lifetime of any man now upon this earth before permanent roads constructed by the Federal Government can reach the great mass of the people of this country.

Furthermore, you will simply beget controversies between different States and different communities as to which one shall first receive the benefit of the permanent roads constructed by the Federal Government It must, therefore, be manifest to all who consider the question that if we are to bring benefit to the people of the United States fairly, equitably, and justly, and have those benefits realized within the lifetime of men now upon this earth, some plan must be adopted which will reach into every community of the United States and encourage the activities of the people in the aggregate.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. REED. With pleasure.

Mr. OVERMAN. Would it not be a better system for the benefit of the people if we were to take this $18,000,000 and divide it among the States according to population? According to population, my State, which has 2,300,000 people, would get over $400,000. If the State of North Carolina would supplement that with $400,000, it would make, in the aggregate, $800,000. Carrying the system down the line into the counties, if each county would supplement what the State gives to a double amount, and the townships would do likewise, by that means the State of North Carolina would have an income of more than a million dollars with which to build good roads. Would not that be better than to give $25 a mile? Would not that produce a great system of roads throughout the United States? Missouri would get something like two or three million dollars on that basis, and would have a great road fund. Would not that, in the Senator's opinion, be a better system of road improvement?

Mr. REED. If I were to stop now and analyze the Senator's plan I would not be able to analyze this plan. The plan he outlines would be an improvement over some I have heard suggested here. There are objections to it, and if I have time later on I will call attention to them. But the point I want to challenge attention to at this time is that the great movement is on in the United States for better roads and the demand for Federal aid is Nation-wide. Federal aid will be granted by this Congress or by some other Congress in some form, and that before long.

The plan that is now submitted by the House of Representatives appeals to me for many reasons, and I want to present those reasons. I do so with fear and trembling, because the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], to whom I yielded a little while ago, informed us in language that was certainly sufficiently plain that "no human being with a particle of sense can believe that the bill will be of any substantial benefit." That language was so highly complimentary to the House of Representatives, which passed the bill by a decisive vote; to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who but a few moments previously had occupied the floor in earnest advocacy of the measure; and fell with such crushing force upon the spirits of all those who have ventured to indulge the notion that the House bill really did have some sense in it, that I feel it is an act of extreme temerity to take the floor and advocate the bill. However, I am somewhat reconciled to the sad condition in which the Senator's denunciation has left me by the fact that the Senator, further denouncing the bill, declared it to be only "a sop thrown to Cerberus, to wit, the people."

This is the first time I have ever heard the people of the United States catalogued with the dog-headed monster Milton placed on guard at the gates of hell. I venture the opinion that if the Senator from Mississippi continues to indulge in that kind of language regarding the people, after they have spoken at another election the Senator will be inclined to further refer to Milton, and in describing the people's protest to exclaim:

> With wide Cerberean mouths full loud, they rung
> A hideous peal.

I am astonished that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] should so vehemently oppose this bill. He comes from an agricultural State, where they need good roads as much as they are needed in other States. Kansas is a splendid State, but her population is widely scattered. The farmers of Kansas must reach their market places over the ordinary country dirt roads.

So far as I am personally concerned, I happen to live in a county that has nearly 300 miles of macadam road, which were paid for out of the revenues of that county. No one can deny that the rock roads of the county have added to the value of the farms four or five times their actual cost. And while I am upon that question I want to say there must be a singular way of letting road work in Massachusetts. If it costs $41,000 to build 2½ miles of macadam road in Massachusetts, where there is more rock to the square acre than any other place on earth, I can not understand why we are able to build rock roads in my State for from $3,000 to $4,000 a mile.

Mr. President, there has been a claim made here that for the Government of the United States to pay something to encourage good roads will destroy all of the rights of the sovereign States. That was the plea offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. If ever there was a place where the doctrine of State rights was absolutely upon foreign territory, it was when it found a place upon the lips of the Senator from New York. State rights! How are they invaded under this bill? Let us examine its language. Under this bill the Federal Government does not have the right to enter a single State, to stick a spade in a single road, to lay its hand of authority upon a single culvert, to do anything to a single bridge, to interfere in the slightest degree with a single local authority.

What the Federal Government does, all it is proposed it shall do is this: When the local authorities have brought a road up to a certain standard then, and not till then, the Federal Government takes action. What is that action? The Government simply pays a premium to the State authorities of $15, $20, or $25 a mile, dependent upon the character of the road. If anybody will tell me how the payment of that money destroys the rights of sovereign States, how it strikes down those privileges reserved to the people of the States by the Federal Constitution, then he can tell me something which, indeed, I might characterize in the language of the Senator from Mississippi as a proposition which no man of sense can understand.

Mr. President, this doctrine of State rights which has been urged to-day by those who never defended it before, and never will again, has a strange sound. It is proposed by this bill that the Federal Government shall aid in improving roads over which the Federal agents, to wit, the carriers of the mails, travel upon Federal business. We are told if the Government appropriates some money for that purpose it destroys the rights of the sovereign States.

Ah, Mr. President, we did not hear that cry when under the claim of establishing and improving post routes the General Government granted of the public domain millions of acres to great railway companies. That was eulogized as an act of patriotism. The doctrine of State rights did not appear in ghostly warning before the predecessors of the Senator from New York nor stay the hand of his party when it looted the public domain and plundered the people under the pretext of aiding in the establishment of post roads.

Moreover, if it is an invasion of the doctrine of State rights for the Government to appropriate money to improve the country roads over which it carries the mails, what shall we say of the act of the Government when it expends millions of dollars to improve the rivers of this land upon the claim that they are public highways over which the mails and commerce of the country can be carried? If this appropriation of a few dollars to each county or road district in the United States will destroy the rights of these sovereign States, I ask why our rights have not already been destroyed by the fact that we have expended thousands of dollars of the public moneys to build canals over which the commerce of the land may go and the mails may be carried; why it is that the improvement of harbors lying along the coasts of Massachusetts and New York have not already sapped the independence of the States; why it is that Senators rise up in clamorous protest against the expenditure of this money to build roads to the farms of the land, claiming that thereby the rights of the sovereign States will be destroyed, when they have established a policy of taxing the farmers upon everything they put upon their backs and every implement of their husbandry for the benefit of mills and manufactures of certain other States? State rights, in the conception of these Senators, is a very good doctrine to get back of when they want to prevent the doing anything for the benefit of the farmers of the United States, but it has never yet stood in their way when they wanted to give the people's lands or money to the railroads. It has never disturbed them when they taxed the people of all the States for the benefit of the great monopolies of the East.

Mr. President, the same influences fight this measure, which proposes to do something for the farmers, that fights for every measure that proposes to levy a tribute upon the farmers. I, of course, do not apply that remark to those who are honestly in favor of road improvement, but who take exception to this particular plan and think a better one can be adopted, but I do apply it to those gentlemen who are always willing to put their hands into the Public Treasury when there is something to be done for the great cities of this country or the great manufacturing industries of their particular communities.

Mr. President, let us see what a frightful thing this bill is. It is said it will take $20,000,000. That is less than the price of two battleships equipped; it is about the price of two battleships unequipped. Its influence, if those who advocate it are not mistaken, will be felt in every hamlet and village of the United States. Its benefits, if those who advocate it are not mistaken, will be participated in by every man, woman, and child of the United States. Each good road in the country lessens the labor and cost of bringing goods to town; you can not build a good road in the country but you encourage men to go from the cities to the farms.

The cause that is to-day denuding the rural districts of their population is found principally in the fact that there are so many difficulties attendant upon farm life which do not go with city life. Each time you build a better road between the farm and the town you make the farm a more desirable place of residence. Each time you induce a family to remove from the city to the country you help to reduce the cost of living in the city. When the time comes that splendid roads lead from every city and village to every farm of the land, when the telephone reaches all farmhouses, and the trolley lines cut across all parts of this country, you will find that men and women will want to return to the country where they can enjoy the beauties of country life and at the same time enjoy some of the advantages of city life. So that when you build these roads to the city the benefit is not limited to the country, the benefit is not limited to the farm alone; a corresponding benefit flows to the inhabitants of the city.

Mr. President, let us look at this bill just as it is, not as it has been pictured in the vain imaginings of men who have not read it or who do not choose to discuss it fairly. I will admit frankly that no plan or scheme of this kind can possibly be entered upon where objections do not rise to confront us. But I also insist that if we forever pause in the presence of all objections, we will never make a beginning, and consequently we can never hope to make an end of the enterprise.

Let us look at the bill just as it is: First, it is not true, as was urged here by opponents of the measure, that the moneys to be paid under this bill will simply be handed over to road overseers and by them squandered so that no benefits will be realized by the Government or the people. The Senators who make that objection have not read the measure or do not choose to understand its terms. There is no attempt here to turn this money over to road overseers and permit them to waste it and give nothing in return. The proposition contained in this bill is that when a road has been brought up to a certain standard and has been maintained at that standard, that then, and not until then, the money shall be paid. A Federal authority passes upon the question whether the road has been brought up to that standard. And so, Mr. President, I insist that it is unfair to make the statements that have been made, and that such assertions are in the face of the bill itself.

The language of the bill is expressed:

> The United States shall not pay any compensation or toll for such use of such highways other than that provided for in this section, and shall pay no compensation whatever for the use of any highway not falling within classes A, B, or C.
>
> * * * * * * *
> That any question arising as to the proper classification of any road used for transporting rural or star route mail shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Not by a road overseer, but by a Federal authority.

> That the compensation herein provided for shall be paid at the end of each fiscal year by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn upon him by the Postmaster General to the officers entitled to the custody of the funds of the respective highways entitled to compensation under this act.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] yield to me that I may present a conference report on the legislative appropriation bill and ask to have it printed?

Mr. REED. I yield for that purpose.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I submit the conference report on the legislative appropriation bill (H. R. 24023) and ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received and printed.

RECESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri will kindly suspend. The hour of 6 o'clock having arrived, the Senate stands in recess until 8 o'clock this evening, under the order already passed.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., on the expiration of the recess.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President, I present a conference report on the agricultural appropriation bill. I desire to have it printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire presents a conference report and asks that it be printed in the RECORD without reading. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18960) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 42, 57, 58, 72, 73, 101, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 111, 120, 124, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 155, 170.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 43, 44, 46, 47, 49, 51, 53, 54, 55, 62, 63, 64, 67, 68, 70, 75, 76, 78, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 91, 93, 98, 99, 100, 108, 110, 112, 114, 118, 119, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 165, 166, 167, 168, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 179, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 45, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$600,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 48, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$1,217,866"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "the," where it occurs the first time in the amendment, strike out the words "exhibition of animals"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 52, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$1,670,316"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 56, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$25,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 59, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$8,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 60, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$52,430"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 61, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$40,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 65, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$80,765"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 66, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$35,795"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 69, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$300,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 71, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "demonstrations," strike out the word "in" and insert the words "and for"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 74, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$125,000" and add thereto the following: "Provided, however, That the sum of $50,000 of this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be used for the purchase of land and equipment and the construction of buildings necessary to establish, equip, and maintain an experimental farm in the northern section of the Great Plains area to demonstrate the kind and character of plants, shrubs, trees, berries, and vegetables best adapted to the climate and soil of the semiarid lands of the United States: Provided further, That the limitation in this act as to the cost of farm buildings shall not apply to this paragraph"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 77, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$1,658,080"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 79, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$2,323,580"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 85, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language inserted by said amendment insert the following: "That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed and required to select, classify, and segregate, as soon as practicable, all lands within the boundaries of national forests that may be opened to settlement and entry under the homestead laws applicable to the national forests, and the sum of $25,000 is hereby appropriated for the purposes aforesaid"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 86, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$35,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 87, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of the amendment, after the word "forests," insert the following: "but it is not the intent of this provision to restrict the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to permit the free use of timber as provided in the act of June 4, 1897"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 88, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$170,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 89, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language inserted by said amendment insert the following: "And the Secretary of Agriculture shall investigate the best methods of distillation of Douglas fir and other northwestern species of fir and timber and ascertain the yields of distillates of various species, and the refining and commercial use of the distillates"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 90, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$20,180"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 92, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$165,640"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 94, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$400,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 95, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language inserted by said amendment insert the following as a new paragraph:

"That an additional 10 per cent of all moneys received from the national forests during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, shall be available at the end thereof, to be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture for the construction and maintenance of roads and trails within the national forests in the States from which such proceeds are derived; but the Secretary of Agriculture may, whenever practicable, in the construction and maintenance of such roads, secure the cooperation or aid of the proper State or Territorial authorities in the furtherance of any system of highways of which such roads may be made a part."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 96, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$3,107,285"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 97, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$5,343,045"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 102, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$968,940"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 109, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$75,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 113, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$30,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 115, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$328,750"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 116, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$672,340"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 117, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said said amendment insert the following as a new paragraph:

"For the establishment of a national game preserve, to be known as the Wind Cave National Game Preserve, upon the lands embraced within the boundaries of the Wind Cave National Park, in the State of South Dakota, for a permanent national range for a herd of buffalo to be presented to the United States by the American Bison Society, and for such other native American game animals as may be placed therein. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to acquire by purchase or condemnation such adjacent lands as may be necessary for the purpose of assuring an adequate, permanent water supply, and to inclose the said game preserve with a good and substantial fence and to erect thereon all necessary sheds and buildings for the proper care and maintenance of the said animals, $26,000, to be available until expended."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 121, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$45,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 122, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$166,300"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 123, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$191,400"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 152, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$194,700"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 153, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$219,700"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 154, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language inserted by said amendment insert the following: "And that the Secretary of Agriculture be and he is hereby directed to secure from the various branches of the department having authority to investigate such matters, reports relative to systems of marketing farm products, cooperative or otherwise, in practice in various sections of the United States and of the demand for such products in various trade centers, and shall make such recommendations to Congress relative to further investigation of these questions and the dissemination of such information as he shall deem necessary"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 163, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$100,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 164, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$1,871,700"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 169, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$16,264,496"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 178, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language inserted by said amendment insert the following: "To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the cultivation, acclimating, and development of the most nutritious and productive types of potatoes, and for the purpose of experimentation and development of American sugar-beet seed adapted to the irrigated lands of the arid West, $10,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 180, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert $16,651,496; and the Senate agree to the same.

VANCOUVER MILITARY RESERVATION, WASH.

Mr. WARREN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4663) granting to the Washington-Oregon Corporation a right for an electric railroad, and for telephone, telegraph, and electric-transmission lines across the Vancouver Military Reservation, in the State of Washington, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 3.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1 and 2, and agree to the same.

The report was agreed to.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21279) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, we have had a discussion of this section in the Post Office appropriation bill by several Senators, but by none from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, who favor the committee amendment as against the provision in the House bill. I joined with the majority of the committee in the opinion that it is not wise at this time, if it ever shall be, to adopt the provision contained in the bill as it passed the House. What I shall have to say will not detain the Senate long, but in brief outline I desire to state the considerations which led the majority of the committee to the conclusion they reached.

It will be noticed by an examination of the House provision that while there is a provision as to the roads falling in the classes A and B, and the width of the road is prescribed, as to class C there is no requirement as to the width of the road. A little further examination into class C roads will, in my judgment, lead to the conclusion that this was not an oversight on the part of the framers of this House provision, because, as it is said:

> Class C shall embrace roads * * * with ample side ditches, so constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, continuously kept well compacted, and with a firm, smooth surface, by dragging or other adequate means.

And there is this remarkable conclusion to that provision:

> So that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times.

I assume it will not be disputed that almost any of these 2,000,000 miles of dirt road are passable for wheeled vehicles.

The objections to the provision of the bill briefly stated are these. First, it is considered to be impracticable. The Chief of the Office of Good Roads of the Agricultural Department appeared before the committee in opposition to the House provision. He stated that in order to protect the Government it would be necessary to have inspections of these roads. Many of the roads falling under class C are clay roads. In fact, that is one class of roads designated specifically as falling within class C.

It must be admitted, Mr. President, that the Government can not have an inspector go every day or every week or every month or every quarter over these country roads. The most that can reasonably be expected is that an inspector will get over the roads about once during a year.

Now, a clay road in dry weather is as good as a macadam road, and in wet weather it is the worst road imaginable. So it will work out that if the inspector strikes a part of the country in dry weather in which the roads are clay he will approve the road as being entitled to the benefit of this provision of the act, and when he goes into another part of the country during the wet season he condemns the road as not complying with the provision of the act. Yet one road is equally as good as the other and equally as much entitled to be compensated for as the other.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the bill does not provide for any kind of inspection of roads?

Mr. BRYAN. It does not provide for any kind of inspection.

Mr. OVERMAN. Some roads in my state are bad in the winter time and in the summer time they are fine. Is there no provision as to how the roads shall be inspected?

Mr. BRYAN. No, sir. So if the inspector goes into North Carolina in the wintertime and inspects their roads none of them will pass, and if he goes into Alabama in the wintertime in dry weather they will all pass.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, the bill provides that when there is a dispute between the Post Office Department and the local authorities as to whether a road has measured up to the requirements, and if they are not satisfied with the ruling of the Post Office Department, then the Secretary of Agriculture can make an examination to ascertain as to whether the road measures up so as to obtain the money.

Mr. BRYAN. That is one of the most humorous features of the bill. I heard the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] a short while ago say, in answer to what was stated by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], that if no superintendent kept one of these roads up to the standard the Secretary of Agriculture would do it. Can the Senator from Virginia tell me how the Secretary of Agriculture of this great Government can perform the duties he is required to perform and at the same time during his vacation find leisure to inspect over a million miles of dirt roads?

Mr. SWANSON. Since the Senator has asked me the question, I can answer it very easily. There goes over every one of these roads every day a star-route contractor or a rural-delivery carrier. They are anxious to have good roads, because they can do their work more easily and more cheaply.

The Post Office Department can require them every week and every day, if it sees proper, to make a report to that department as to the condition of the road over which they pass. It has over every one of these roads an individual under the pay of the Government—under the control of the Government—giving it daily inspection—daily examination in going over it. Consequently the department can require its officer to make his report. It seems to me that I know of nothing the Government pays for where it has such an efficient quick way to get daily inspection as it has under this bill over rural-delivery routes and over star routes.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. How could the Secretary of Agriculture get that information from them?

Mr. SWANSON. I will tell you how. All these reports come in from the rural carrier or the star-route contractor. If the roads are not sufficient to justify the payment of the money, and a dispute arises as to whether the money shall be paid or not, then the Agricultural Department can have the power to go there and settle it. But I am willing to adopt an amendment, and leave it to the Post Office Department to pass on it and let its decision be final, so far as the expense to be incurred is concerned. I favor that in preference to having the Agricultural Department finally pass on it.

When the Government erects a public building it has an inspector there daily in its pay to see whether there is good material put in the building or not, but the Government, in this case, has a man in its pay subject to its order, a man interested in reporting a bad road and having it improved, and the department can require him to make a daily report if it sees proper.

Mr. BRYAN. I think if the Senator from Virginia takes time to reflect, he will himself be convinced that there are several other amendments which he also might be willing to accept to the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. I am not talking about other amendments. I favored that in committee for the simple reason that I believe the inspection will be done better by traveling over it by Government officials under the control and subject to the rules and regulations of the department, officials who are interested in reporting bad roads, and that it would be a very good guaranty to the Government that it would not pay for any roads except the roads that are good.

Mr. BRYAN. At least the Senator from Virginia has abandoned the idea that the Secretary of Agriculture must personally inspect all these roads, and it now comes down to this, that he will depend upon the star-route contractors and the rural-mail carriers.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, every star-route contractor——

Mr. BRYAN. I should like to finish this one point, and then the Senator can——

Mr. SWANSON. I will not interrupt the Senator further unless it is agreeable to him. Besides, the Post Office Department has now four or five hundred inspectors subject to its control. They yearly visit the star routes to see whether the boxes are properly located and to hear all complaints and to see that the rural carriers discharge their duties. If there is any complaint that a road is not satisfactory, there is already a large force of inspectors who go over these routes two or three times a year to see that the rural carrier does his duty. The same inspectors could also see as to the condition of the roads and report on their condition.

Mr. BRYAN. So it comes to this in the end, that the roads will have to be inspected. If it would be necessary to use inspectors in addition to those already employed, then there would be that much additional cost.

That brings me to a consideration of a statement made by the Chief of the Office of Good Roads before the committee. The Senator from Virginia thinks that the officer is prejudiced against good roads, and especially against this bill, but as I understand his position he is heartily in favor of Federal aid to good roads, but he does not believe this is the character of bill that should be adopted by Congress.

He said that in the beginning it would cost $700,000 to have these roads inspected and classified, and that annually thereafter it would cost $200,000 to have them inspected once a year. In the report of the House committee, and it is undoubtedly true, they expect every one of these roads used for rural routes to come within one of the three classes.

Now, Mr. President, if we are going to have a rigid inspection, I undertake to say that a very small percentage of the country roads will come even under class C. If the inspection is to be a mere formality, and, as indicated by the report of the House committee, all these roads are to get under class C, then I submit that the spending of the $700,000 in the first place and the spending of a quarter of a million dollars annually in the second place is a useless waste of money.

Mr WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask the Senator from Florida a question. Of course, he knows who the rural free delivery carriers are in our country. Can he imagine a rural free delivery carrier incurring the enmity of the county road supervisors and contractors by reporting their roads to be in a bad condition and have the Government cut off the payment of $20 a mile?

Mr. BRYAN. I think a man would have highly imaginative powers to conceive anything of that kind.

Mr. SWANSON. Can you imagine a rural free delivery carrier reporting a road in good condition, splendid and passable, when it might be inspected a week afterwards by a general inspector who would ascertain that he had made a false report, and he would stand the risk of being dismissed from the Government service for having sent in false reports to the Government?

Mr. WILLIAMS. He could very easily say it was in good condition when he made the report, but bad when the inspector got there.

Mr. BRYAN. He would say it had rained in the meantime.

Mr. SWANSON. It will be the reverse. Instead of the carrier reporting the roads good the usual custom has been to report them bad to give an excuse why they did not bring the mail in properly to meet the train. A rural carrier has a certain schedule. If he reports that the roads are good he has to make the schedule on a good road, and if he does not make the schedule in time it could not be any excuse that the roads were bad.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will ask the Senator from Virginia whether in a part of Virginia and a part of North Carolina the roads are not for about six months very bad and for about six months very good? Would they be entitled to this $10 or $15 for the whole year or would they only get half of it for half a year?

Mr. SWANSON. It is the proportion for the time the roads were kept in good order.

Mr. OVERMAN. But half the year the roads would be good and half the year they would be bad.

Mr. SWANSON. You get paid for all the time that you keep the roads in good order. You would get compensation for the good work you did, and no pay until you got the roads in good order and rendered good service.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How long does the provision require good roads before they can receive anything?

Mr. SWANSON. The provision speaks for itself. I suppose the Senator has read it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My recollection is that it is 12 months.

Mr. SWANSON. No.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the Senator for information.

Mr. SWANSON. My opinion is that if you get the entire pay it must be for the entire 12 months.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought from my reading of the bill that it had to be for at least the specified time. Let us look that up.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, if it be true that it is the intention that all these roads used for the carriage of mails over rural routes are to be beneficiaries of this provision we might as well be frank about it, and instead of paying money for useless inspection provide that there shall be paid to the State treasury of each State the amount which would come under the provisions of the bill in proportion to the rural routes in that State.

Now, to those Senators who to-day have argued so strenuously for the farmer and for the man who lives in the country and on these rural routes, who are so anxious to see this system extended so that all of those who do not have the opportunity and the benefits of rural route at all, I submit this proposition:

On the average standard route there will be an additional expense of between four and five hundred dollars, for which provision must be made, so that it will add to the present requirements about 40 per cent; and thereafter when you appeal to the Post Office Department to establish an additional rural route the Postmaster General must figure that it will cost 40 per cent more than heretofore. I submit to the judgment of the Senate whether present routes can be extended and new routes put in as rapidly with this provision as without it.

There is another question which is involved in any good-roads measure we may pass. I apprehend it has been in the past perhaps one of the causes of the postponement of this matter. Here is a small State with a large population and small area; here is a large State with large area and a small population; one has good roads and one has bad roads; what is fair as between those States? The State of small area, large population, good roads, and few rural routes would receive a relatively small proportion of the appropriation, while a State of large area, small population, bad roads, and many rural routes would receive a relatively large proportion of the appropriation. Let me illustrate that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me for a moment, we were talking a moment ago about a matter in connection with which I want to read a provision of the bill. If anybody can make heads or tails out of it, I can not. It is as follows:

That the compensation herein provided for shall be paid at the end of each fiscal year by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn upon him by the Postmaster General to the officers entitled to the custody of the funds of the respective highways entitled to compensation under this act under and in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed jointly by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General.

There is no provision at all for any division of money in proportion to the number of months that the road has been kept good; there is no provision requiring that the road should have been good for any specific time prior to the payment. That is all that is in the bill about it.

Mr. BRYAN. There is a provision further back, in the same section, which says payments shall be paid at the rate of $15, $20, or $25 per year.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is per mile.

Mr. BRYAN. Per mile.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; it is provided that compensation shall be paid at the end of the fiscal year, but there is nothing to justify the assertion that if the road was good six months and bad six months $7.50 would be paid.

Mr. BRYAN. Oh, it is impossible, as I said, probably before the Senator came in——

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will allow me a moment, there is nothing which prescribes any specified length of time during which the road shall have been good prior to payment.

Mr. BRYAN. In a wet winter the roads may be bad and almost impassable, yet at the time the inspector comes—and he can not come but once a year, and is not expected to come oftener—they may be in good condition and so will be allowed payment for the year, and necessarily so. I agree with the Senator from Mississippi that a rural-route mail carrier living on the route, a citizen of the community he is serving, securing his position because of the indorsement of his neighbors, anxious to see all the money possible given to his community, is not going to be unusually active in reporting cases where the roads fall below the standard fixed by the Post Office Department.

Now, Mr. President, I want to illustrate the statement I made when the Senator from Mississippi last interrupted me. Perhaps I had better repeat that statement. It was that a State of small area, large population, good roads, and few rural routes would receive a relatively small proportion of the appropriation, while a State of large area, small population, bad roads, and many rural routes would receive a relatively large proportion of the appropriation.

The State of Massachusetts has an area of 8,315 square miles, a rural-route mileage of 6,673, and a population of 3,366,416. Forty-nine per cent of the roads in Massachusetts are improved roads, and under the provisions of this bill they would get about $100,000. The State of Texas has an area of 265,780 square miles, a rural-route mileage of 45,751, and a population of 3,896,542, slightly in excess of the population of Massachusetts; yet the improved roads in Texas are only 3.8 per cent of the road mileage of the State. Missouri has 69,415 square miles of area, and would be entitled to draw under this bill for 48,810 miles of rural roads. She has a population of 3,293,335, and 4.41 per cent of her roads are improved; so that both Texas and Missouri would get from seven and a half to eight times as much as the State of Massachusetts, although the improved roads in both Missouri and Texas fall below 5 per cent of the total road mileage, while the roads of Massachusetts are 49 per cent improved.

States of relatively large area, large population, and few rural routes would receive a relatively small proportion, while States of relatively small area but many rural routes would receive a relatively large proportion, although the percentage of the good roads in each did not materially differ. Take Texas again, a State of large area and large population, but, as compared with some States, of relatively small mileage of rural routes. Kansas has an area of 81,000 square miles, 49,000 miles in rural routes, and 1,690,000 population—less than one-third of the area of Texas, less than half of the population of Texas—but would get $50,000 more money per annum, although the roads in Texas are improved 3.80 per cent and the roads in Kansas are 0.38 per cent improved. Iowa, with a smaller area than Kansas, 55,000 square miles, with a larger rural-route mileage, 60,000 miles, and with a slightly larger population, 2,200,000, would get $110,000 more than Kansas and $150,000 more than the State of Texas.

Mr. President, Senators interested in this matter would find House Document 582 of the present session interesting reading. It was prepared by the Department of Agriculture in 1909. On page 40 of that document is a valuable table, giving, by States, the total mileage in 1904 and 1909 of improved roads and the percentage of all roads improved. After the committee had considered the House provision and had heard a large delegation from the other House, appearing in behalf of the bill, the Chief of the Office of Good Roads appeared to oppose the provision or to give his opinion; I believe he was under subpœna by the committee; I do not think he volunteered to come.

After hearing his testimony it occurred to me that it would be valuable to know the mileage by States of rural-route roads. Information had been given already—and it can be found in some of the reports by the Chief of the Office of Good Roads or some other officer of the Department of Agriculture—as to the number of routes by States, but not the mileage by States. I requested him to get up that information for me. He did so after considerable trouble and some time. I have taken from this House document information bearing upon this particular question, and have taken from his report the rural-route mileage by States. I have added to that the area of each State in square miles, and also the population, so that Senators can take this table and at a glance ascertain about what their States would be entitled to under this appropriation, and from a study of it they will be convinced, in my judgment, that it would not be fair or proper to pass such a provision as this upon the idea that we are undertaking to encourage the building of good roads.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly.
